

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

P R E F A C E.

HAppy is the Man that has no other Acquaintance with Booksellers, than what is Contracted by Reading the News in their Shops, and perhaps now and then Buying a Book of them; but he, that is so unfortunate, as to have Business with them about Translating, Printing, or Publishing any Thing to the World, has a Miserable Time of it, and ought to be endued with the Patience of Job.

Some Days after I had parted with this Copy, my Bookseller asked me when I would go about the Preface; the Preface!—Said I, what do you mean? Mean! Says he, I mean the Preface, the Preface to the Reader. I told him, that what he had Bought was all I had to say to the Reader, as for my Part; and if he had any Thing to add for himself, he was at Liberty to do as he thought fit. I leave it to any Impartial Judge, if this was not Fair between Man and Man: Yet the Bookseller, far from being satisfied with so Reasonable an Answer, seemed to be very angry, and strenuously insisted upon a Preface, telling me over and over, that he never heard of an Author that denied a Preface before, that it was a Folly to dispute it, that he could not Sell the Book without, and that in short a Preface he must have: Having no Mind to be huff'd, and bubbled out of my La-

The P R E F A C E.

The P R E F A C E.

Labour into the Bargain, I grew angry in my Turn, and told him plainly, he should have none of me; the Book was his own, if he would not Sell it, he might stop Ovens with it if he pleased; at last, seeing me thus resolute, and knowing, that there was no Act of Parliament that obliged People to make Prefaces in spight of their Teeth, he put on a more obliging Countenance, and came to Perswasions, which having more Influence upon me than his rougher Language, I began to be more tractable, we went to the Tavern, where talking of Prefaces, I grew very good Humour'd, and that Prefacing might not be wanting, instead of One, I promised him Two: The next Day considering what a Ridiculous Promise I had made, and yet willing to be as good as my Word, I thought on this Expedient of letting you know what had happened between us, and as a Wheel within a Wheel, prefixing it to the Preface.

Is it possible, says the Ingenious Critick, that a Man of any Brains should be such a Coxcomb, as to put down such Balderdash, and play the Buffoon without Wit or Sence, in the very Beginning of a Book ; thus People judge, when they are ignorant of a Man's Aim. I have a mortal Antipathy against Prefaces, this I had a Fancy to acquaint my Reader with, which being supposed, I'll justify to any Critick's Face, that I have said nothing but what is very much to the Purpose ; that is, to my Purpose, because I conceive, that the best Way a Man can shew the Reluctancy of his Mind to an Undertaking, is by being Imper-

continent in the Execution ; but why, says another, should you hate Prefaces? The Reason is plain, because I am Honest, and I never saw any, (those of Saints excepted,) but what were full of Hypocrisie and Dissimulation. Does ever People tell you in their Prefaces, that they write for Profit, or for Glory? And yet it is most certain, that they do it either for the one or the other, but instead of that, with abundance of Impudence, they'll protest that they have no other Aim than the Reader's Good, which commonly is an Abominable Lie. One would make you believe that he is more Learned and Knowing than in his own Conscience he knows himself to be ; another points at some of the best Things in the Book, and confesses they are Faults, whilst in Profound Silence he passes by those those Things which he knows to be really such. I was once with an Author, that was about the same Business as I am now ; he had occasion for Three or Four Latin Words, but not being very well acquainted with one of them, he ran to his Dictionary to see what Gender it was of ; I don't blame him for taking the Benefit of another Man's Labour ; but don't you think he would have been Hang'd before he'd have put this in his Preface ; therefore believe me, good Reader, no Man of Integrity can love a Sort of Writing, in which hitherto People have not thought fit to speak the real Sentiments of their Hearts ; if I had been let alone, this would have been the first ; and I'll tell ye how : Since these Dialogues have been made, I found a great many Faults in the Contrivance, the

Lan-

Language, and a great many other Things, which I design'd to have made a Catalogue of, and shew'd you in the Front, with the same Candour as the Printer has own'd his in the Rear. But, says the Earthly-minded Book-seller, what d' you mean? Have you a Mind to Damn the Book? What Mortal that sees so many Mistakes before, and so many Errata behind, will be such a Fool as to give Money for the Middle, that contains 'em? So you see, gentle Reader, my Hands are tied. The next I design'd, was to take away whatever might create Misunderstandings between you and me; for tho' I would have been very glad to shew you my Faults, yet I am as unwilling that you should take those Things to be Faults, which in Reality are not: But now I have talk'd away my Time, to do it as I should do. However, the Preface not being long enough yet, as I fancy, to please the Book-feller, give me leave to furnish you with a few Cautions, which I'll perform as concisely as is possible.

When in the First Dialogue you meet with any Thing harsh, and perhaps very disagreeable to the Ladies, suspend your Judgment till you come to the Second ; for there you'll find, that what Lucinda has said to her Niece before, was only a Sophistical Way of Arguing, to put a Young Beautiful Lady out of Conceit with herself, in hopes to make her neglectful of her Charms. Some People open a Book anywhere, and having read a few Lines, throw it by ; therefore, if you should stumble upon the wicked
So-

The P R E F A C E.

Sophistry of Dorante, I would desire you to go on a little further, to see how his Notions are detested, both by the Aunt and the Niece.

My Design through the whole, is to let young Ladies know whatever is dreadful in Marriage, and this could not be done, but by introducing one that was an Enemy to it. Therefore, tho' Lucinda speaks altogether against Matrimony, don't think that I do so too.

I expect to be Censured for letting Women talk of Politicks, but first mind, how little Antonia says to the Matter, and then examine Lucinda's Character. Erasmus in his Ichthuophagia treats of more Abstruse Matters, than I do in any Part of the Dialogues; and yet the Persons in all Probability are less Accomplish'd than than mine; for one is a Butcher, and the other a Fishmonger.

By leaving the Story of Leonora unfinished, you may expect I intend to go on.

THE FIRST DIALOGUE BETWEEN LUCINDA,
An Elderly Maiden LADY,
AND ANTONIA, HER NIECE.

Lucinda. Here, Niece, take my Handkerchief, prithee now, if you can find nothing else to cover your Nakedness: If you knew what a Fulsome Sight it was, I am sure you would not go so bare: I can't abide your Naked Breasts heaving up and down, it makes me sick to see it.

Antonia.

Antonia. 'Tisn't clean, Aunt; besides, 'tis so hot I can't endure any Thing about my Neck; I hate to be stifled up so.

Symptom?
Luc. Harkee, Antonia, those little Pretences won't pass upon your Aunt; tisn't the Heat of the Weather, 'tis the Heat of your Blood, your Wantonness, and Lascivious Thoughts, 'tis they, that are the Cause of all your immoderate Behaviour. Do I ever go so? Or do ye think I han't Breasts as well as you?

Ant. When I am as Old as you, Aunt, perhaps I'll do as you do: Tho' you are pleased to find fault with my Behaviour, I don't know that ever I was guilty of any Immodesty in my Life: I don't invent the Fashions; but indeed I don't love to be pointed at for affecting Singularity. I Dress my self as I see other young Gentlewomen do; my Stays are not cut lower than other Peoples.

Luc. Don't make so many Excuses, Dear Child; what signifies the Fashion? What signifies your Stays? Yesterday 'twas as hot again as it is now, then all the while we were in the Garden, rather than to have your White Skin Tann'd you could endure your Handkerchief, and your Mask, both; then you was close muffled up, and I did not hear you once complain of being stifled.

Ant. As long as I use no Art to make my Skin White. I hope 'tis no Sin, Aunt, to keep it from being Sun-burnt.

Luc. Yes; and for what Reason do you keep it white? To raise up sinful Thoughts in others: If your Breasts were Yellow or Freckled, you know, they would not be so inviting to the Fellows;

lows ; but I declare it, was I a Man I'd spit at them.

Ant. Then if you was a Man, Aunt, you would not be counted a very Civil one.

Luc. Oh! How I should loath the Creatures that should shew such monstrous Impudence! You talk of Dressing your self, this is Unaresling; you are half-naked: As for your Stays, if -/ it be the Fashion to have 'em cut so, you might find out something else to cover your Body ; but you are so far from striving to hide it, that the very Shift is put by, for fear it should hinder the Eye: I can't call it taking up your Smock, but it is pulling it off, which is worse ; suppose your Stays were cut as low as your Navel, pray would ye shew it? Nay, it does not want above Three or Four Inches of it now. Women, in strictness, should never appear in Publick but Veil'd ; at least Young Women should never shew their Faces to any Men, but their nearest Relations.

Ant. Indeed, Aunt, when 'tis the Fashion to be veil'd I won't stick out, but I shall hardly begin first.

Luc. I don't bid you be veil'd, Mrs. Perr, but there is abundance of difference between veiling, and going bare-~~ass~~'d. Fashions and Customs, I know, have alter'd with the Times; sometimes People have wore long Cloaths, sometimes short ones; but I never heard, or ever read, of an Age before this, if the People were any ways Civilized, but they had some Garment or other (whatever they did to their Legs and Arms,) to cover the main Body, the Trunk itself; now-a-days, the very Virgins, that should be the Temples of Modesty, go with their Bodies

dies half naked, and not only so, but the Obscene Part of their Body.

Ant. I never knew, that one's Neck was an obscene Part.

Luc. What you call your Neck is ; here your Neck ends at the Collar-bone, this is your Chest, your Bosom, this is the Pit of your Stomach, these are your Breasts ; you make a strange long Neck of it ; and are like the Sign-painters, who only call it a Head, tho' they Paint a Man or a Woman as far as the Waste ; you may as well call it your Chin as your Neck.

Ant. Well, let it be call'd Bosom, or what Part you please, why is it obscene ?

Luc. Why, I wonder you should ask that Question ; can any Thing be more obscene than the very Marks of your Body, by which ye are known to be a Woman : All Vertuous People think it obscene in either Man or Woman to shew any Thing naked that may tempt the other to Wickedness ; but it is much more so, to prostitute those Points, by which the Sexes are distinguished.

Parts

Ant. If that be true, Aunt, a long fussy Beard must be a very obscene Sight, for there the Men differ from our Sex with a witness ; and yet I declare I could see a Beard of a Yard and a half without any manner of Temptation.

Luc. Now you think you have said a mighty Thing, I warrant ye.

Ant. Indeed, Aunt, I wonder any Civil Government should suffer People to draw Moses and Aaron, and all the Patriarchs, with so much Obscenity about 'em. In the Picture of Abraham's Offering, that hangs o'the top of our Stair-case, the Old Gentleman has Hair enough in his Beard

Beard to make him a good handsome Perriwig, which, if he had lived in this Age, no doubt, but Everybody would have advised him to, because he is so very Bald.

Luc. How fain now would you be witty upon Beards, and ridicule, what I said about the Distinction of Sexes, but you only shew your Ignorance. I deny that Beards distinguish the Sex; Beards are Hair, and for the generality, Men, when they arrive to their full Strength, are more or less hairy all over; their Face, Arms, Legs, Breast, no place is free; and, strictly speaking, Men differ from Women in every Thing; their Skin is not so plump as ours, nor the Grain of it fine; their Muscles and Sinews are more Brawny and Conspicuous than ours; we differ in the very Make of our Bodies; Men are broader in the Shoulders, than the Hips, with us it is quite contrary, but by these Things our Sexes are not distinguished. I have known a Woman that had Hair between her Breasts, and some have so much about their Face, that they are forced to clip it every Week; nay, there are Women, that are constantly shaved as well as Men; therefore there can be no Obscenity in that, which is no distinguishing Character.

Ant. Indeed, Aunt, you need not have taken half the Pains to convince me, that Beards are not Obscene, I never thought 'em so, what I said was only in Jest, for I believe few Women are charm'd with them.

Luc. Not so neither, Child, this is another Errour, but as I have shew'd you the Folly of your Comparison of the Mens Beards with Womens Breasts, so now I will shew you your Simplicity, plicity, in thinking that there are no Allurements in Beards, for without question they are design'd as great Ornaments to Men; but as nothing looks Handsome as is not in the Mode, so Beards being not in Fashion, you see Nobody wear 'em, but here and there a poor old Creature, or some nasty slovenly Fellow or other, that would never be very tempting, Beard, or no Beard, and this is the Reason why Women dislike long Beards: Gentlemen now-a-days keep 'em close Shaved, so that there is no knowing a handsome Beard from another; but when it was the Fashion to let 'em grow, no doubt but the Women of those Ages preferr'd a thick, strong, brown, curl'd, bushy Beard, to a thin, lank, straggling one, that had all the Colours of the Rainbow in it: But besides, Beards are Graceful, even as they wear 'em now; for tho' they are cut never so close, there are Signs enough remaining, by which they may be discovered; and consult but your own Thoughts, which do you esteem to be the handsomest Chin? That on which the Marks of a strong manly Beard appears, or that of a milk-chopp'd Fellow, that has not a Hair about his Face, and looks like a Girl in Man's Cloaths?

Ant. Truly, Aunt, I never stare so much in Mens Faces to mind the difference.

Luc. The less the better, assure your self; but leaving the Beards to their Owners, I hope you are satisfied after what I have said, that it is not modest for Women to shew their naked Breasts to all the World.

Ant. I confess, Aunt, I am not of your Opinion, but think that nothing is immodest in Dressing, but when People shew those Parts, which the Custom of the Country bids 'em hide: In some Countries Womens Petticoats reach but a little lower than their Knees; yet if here a Woman, walking along the Street, should pluck up her Coats half Way the Calf of her Leg, Everybody would call her immodest; and therefore if any Parts be Obscene, they must be such as are carefully hid, and not those that are used to be bare.

Luc. O strange! O strange! What Age do we live in? What Notions are these? That no Part is Obscene, when 'tis the Fashion to shew it. Suppose once it should be the Fashion for Women to be covered all over, except from the Naval to half way their Thighs, which would be the Obscene Parts, those that were covered, or those that were in view?

Ant. I don't believe there ever will be such a nasty Fashion, and therefore I need not trouble my Head about that Supposition.

Luc. Dear Antonia, what a wild Creature you are grown, it grieves me to the very Soul to think, how much you are alter'd for the worse, within these Three or Four Years, that ye wrote Woman. I have given you a vertuous Education; my Conscience is discharged; I can do no more: When you was between Fourteen and Fifteen, I thought, I should have had some Comfort of you; but now I see that all my Hopes are blasted; Oh! Then your Cheeks were not stained with those guilty Blushes: How meek was then your Look? How modest your Eyes? Which now rowl like Fire-Balls, and shoot, as if they were ready to fly out of your Head.

eyes

Ant. I am sorry, Aunt, that you should like my Looks worse now I am in Health, than when I was eat up with the Green-Sickness, and my Eyes had no more Liveliness in them, than the Eyes of a dead Whiting.

Luc. Do not talk to me; every Thing about you smells so strong of the Harlot, I can't abide you; what have you done to your Hair? What makes it so bright, and so shining?

Ant. I don't know; I have done nothing to it; I han't put so much as a little Powder in it.

Luc. If it was Red, or Yellow, you would have put enough in it; what an odious Way have you of Dressing your Head; all that Hair there methinks looks most abominably; prithe Niece cut off your Head of Hair, and I'll give you Five Guineas.

Ant. Thank you, Aunt, I might have above Ten for it, if I would sell it; but I am not covetous; neither do I think it looks Handsome for a Gentlewoman to cut off her Hair, for the Lucre of Money; I would do it with all my Heart to please you, if you would stop there; but you are pleased to find so much fault with my Looks in general, I'm afraid, should I cut off my Hair to Day, to Morrow you'd ask me, to put out one of my Eyes, and I should not willingly lose either of them, because they are Fellows.

Luc. If you knew, Antonia, how little your Jestling and Joking becomes ye, when I would give ye Good and Wholesome Advice, you would not be so fond of it. It is, as you say, not only your Hair, that displeases me, but your Forehead, your Eyes, your Lips, your Mein, and Dress, they they are all equally offensive to a Chaste and Vertuous Eye: But above all, that large Tra&t of Clear, Transparent Skin, which you are only pleas'd to call your Neck, though it reaches above half Way your Body.

Ant. You say, Aunt, that shewing our Bosom is indecent, because of our Breasts, by which we are known to be Women; if the-Mischief lyes here, I wonder you never spoke to our Betty, who shews Three Times as much Breast as I.

Luc. What, Betty! Poor Greasie Wench; that with a huge Pair of Dugs stands sweating and broiling over the Fire! She would hide them if she could; you see her Bodice are cramm'd that they are ready to burst. What should she do, pray? If you would not have her leave the remainder open, she must be choaked: She does not do it out of Pride, because she thinks it looks Handsome. Where could be the Temptation, pray, in seeing those Tawny Bigs lye quaking before her like a Tub of Size, though they are penn'd up so close, that she can hardly squeeze the Key of the Pantrey between them. You have made a Fine Comparison: What you do is with a Wicked Design; you shew your Breasts; because you think them attractive and ensnaring: They can't be call'd small indeed, but then they are nothing to your High and Broad Chest. See how filthily and boldly they stand pouting out, and bid defiance to your Stays; one would not think that any Thing made of Flesh could be so hard and ugly, as they are: Nay, you are all of a Piece; do but mind once; with how much Immodesty that Orange, and them Leaves, are stuck o'th' Top of your Stays.

Ant. Ha,

Ant. Ha, ha, ha!

Luc. Do you laugh, Hu'styfe? You have more Reason to cry, to see yourself made an Instrument of the Devil to ruin Souls withal.

Ant. Indeed, Aunt, I could not forbear laughing; when I heard you talk of the Immodesty of the Orange.

Luc. What, do you wonder at that? Don't ye think a Bawd is immodest?

Ant. I suppose so; though I never was acquainted with any, as I know of.

Luc. Would you not think her to be a Bawd, that should turn up a Handsome Young Creature, and shew all what she had to all Comers and Goers?

Ant. Such a one would be a Jade indeed; but what relation has this to the Orange?

Luc. Perhaps you think it much worse to shew the Under-part, than the Upper-part of a Woman, but that's a Grand Mistake; that Part, which is the most handsomest, and consequently the most tempting to Sin, is without doubt the most Abominable Shew. Now which do you think the most Agreeable Part of a Woman? Without Dispute the Upper-part, which you shew: Women are only Handsome as far as now they go naked; and that makes me of your Opinion, that it will never be the Fashion to shew the Lower-parts, for there Women are Ugly, Ill-shaped, Nasty Creatures, or else they would have brought up the Fashion of shewing them long ago. Don't think 'tis let alone out of Modesty: No, they are only afraid Men will despise and hate them for it. Do you not think in your own Conscience, that if the Under-parts of Women were set in as full View, as now the Upper, they they would in a short Time become very loathsome to the Spectators? I remember what just now you ridiculed the Pictures of the Old Patriarchs for; and pray what do think of this?

Ant. I do not understand what you mean, neither do I desire to know any Thing of it: I can only tell ye, that I never thought all this depended upon a Poor Orange; I promise ye, that to Morrow I'll put in a Lemon.

Luc. Then you'll mend the Matter much; Oranges, Lemons, Jessemin, and all manner of Nofegays, or Breast-knots, have the same Effect, and are put there for the same Purpose.

Ant. I always thought so too, and can't imagine, since you are such an Implacable Enemy to Nakedness, you should not approve of Breast-knots and Nofe-gays; for I am sure one's Stays look very bare without something, or other upon them.

Luc. Would you have me believe, they are there to hide any Thing, or to smell to? Poor Girl! They are not placed there on so foolish an Errand; your Aunt knows better; their Business there is to gather the Rays of the Eye, on that White Vale there betwixt your Breasts, and fix it on your Bosom; and as a Spot in a White Cloth draws the Sight to it whether we will or no; so that Orange is set there to engage the Standers-by, and for fear it might be over-look'd, points at the Shew, with which you are so generously pleas'd, at the Expence of your Modesty, to treat the Publick. And you that love to be Witty, Antonia, shall I tell you in a Word how it looks in regard to your Skin?

Ant. What you please, Aunt.

Luc. For

Luc. For all the World like a  to an Advertisement of what you would dispose of.

Ant. All this can't put me out of Humour —

Luc. What are you muttering between your Teeth? You used to be so quick at Repartee, Antonia: How do you like my Simile? Have I galled ye?

Ant. No, Aunt, not at all: For if it be as you say, 'tis to be hop'd I shan't be long without a Chapman; and depend upon it, if I can meet with a good one to my Mind, I'll part with the Cargoe.

Luc. It's easie to be seen, you are weary of it; but you talk of a good one; I believe an indifferent one would serve your Turn.

Ant. I can't help your Centures, Aunt; but I am not so weary of it, as you imagine: It shall never go but on very good Terms.

Luc. Perhaps you don't know, Antonia, that it is a Notion among Merchants, that when Goods have been much expos'd and blown upon, and the Owners seem very desirous to be rid of them, Creditable Dealers won't meddle with them, unless they can get them for a Song.

Ant. For a Song, Aunt! The best he that wears a Head shall never boast of Favours from me, before the Knot is tied.

Luc. What, Niece, do you leave the Metaphor? I thought, that was your Beloved Way of Speaking. Airy Ladies should not express themselves, as the Vulgar do. I am afraid, you can go on with it no further.

Ant. I am not to be accountable for other Ladies Actions; as to my self, I love to make use of my Words according to the Common Acceptation; and I never gave any Reason for this Im-

Imputation, more than the Wantonness and Immodesty, you are pleas'd to charge me with : Nor, Aunt, but I could answer ye in your own Dialect, if I had a Mind to make ye angry.

Luc. Make me angry ! I dare say you don't fear that : Or, was it only an Excuse, to study the whilst ? Pray, Niece, let me hear, what it is you would say ?

Ant. I could say, that when People of Skill like the Goods, they matter but little what Spightful Neighbours speak against them ; that Old Traders commonly envy Young Ones ; that instead of assisting of them, and wishing them well, they endeavour to undermine their Credit, and blow 'em up, if they can : That, generally speaking, it vexes them to the Heart, to see the other thrive, because they unjustly look upon them, as so many Intruders into their Business. I could say, that they often maliciously give an Ill Name to New Beginners for no other Reason, than to blast their Reputation, and undervalue their Commodities only to spoil a good Bargain.

Luc. So, Niece, I hear that right or wrong you can say a great deal ; but if by Old Traders you mean me, you are mightily mistaken, for I never dealt that Way.

Ant. You never was Married indeed.

Luc. Your Spleen don't offend me, Niece ; out with it ; you would say I did worse.

Ant. I don't say so : I am not so Censorious as others.

Luc. But you deserve more to be censured than those others ; for I can never think, if any Thing offer'd, you would be so difficult, or stand upon those Punctillo's, you talk off ; and I am apt to believe, believe, that rather than keep the Commodity upon your Hands, you'd give Trust by Retail.

Ant. Pray Aunt speak plain, and tell me, you believe I'm a Common Whore.

Luc. Could the Courteous Antonia be ever Cruel? No sure; you have no denying Face, Child: And when People are so obliging in shewing their Goods, who would not think, but that any one might have a Sample for asking? — How! In Tears, Niece! Melting with Remorse? Do ye plead guilty?

Ant. You shall think as you please, Aunt; 'tis my Comfort, that all your Foul Aspersions can't make me so: I don't Cry, because I am Conscious of any Crime; it is my Wrong'd Innocence that bleeds through my Eyes.

Luc. That was an Heroick Flight, Niece, and would do well in a Tragedy, if it ben't in one already.

Ant. I'd rather be buried alive, than be thus tormented every Day: And pray for what? For not being Lame, Blind, or Crooked: If I was as frightful as the Devil, perhaps I should lead a better Life; for whenever I have any Thing about me that looks tolerably well of late, I am sure to be abused for it. If my Mother might have lived to see me grow up: She would have taken delight in it, Poor Woman! But I have neither Father nor Mother, my Sister's but a Child; would it not make a Stone weep, to see the only Relation, that should take my Part, set all her Wit to work to render me odious, and blast my Reputation, for nothing else, but because I won't be singular, and dress my self as other Young Ladies do: My Father was a Baronet; 'tis true, he liv'd to spend all he had; but then my Aunt Aunt that's dead has handsomely provided for us. Five Thousand Pound is no Despicable Fortune for a Young Woman that's of a Good Family, I don't go above it, nor covet Rich Cloaths, I love to be clean, and have my Things made fashionable: You gave me Education, I own it, and thank ye for it; but then on my Side, have I not always paid ye the same Respect, as if you had been my own Mother? What have I done to deserve your Ill-will? Do I converse with any Body, that is not suitable to my Quality? What Indiscretion have I been guilty of? Who is more reserv'd in Mens Company than I? I never was alone with one in my Life: unless it was in seeing me home from some Ball, Publick Entertainment, or other Solemnity, where it would have been Rudeness to deny 'em; and yet had I been the Strumpet to a Regiment of Foot Soldiers, you could not have talk'd to me worse than you do. I think my self in Heaven, when I enjoy but one Hour without being rail'd at.

Luc. Indeed, Antonia, the Hardships you labour under are beyond Measure, at least any Body would think so, to see ye in this Posture, and hear your Moan; for it is not to be believed that a Young Lady, to whom Nature has been so lavish, and Fortune no niggard; one that never shew'd a great Dislike to the World, should with herself buried Alive, rather than bear her Torments any longer, unless they exceeded the Common Rate of Afflictions: However, I had rather see ye in this Humour than when you are laughing at all Good Council, and jeering every Thing that's Chaste and Sober.

Ant. I suppose so; because now I look worse.

Luc.

Luc. I don't think you do: But it is not for that; it is because I love a Meek Spirit better than a Stubborn one.

Ant. Your Servant, Aunt.

Luc. Whither would ye go?

Ant. Up into my Chamber, unless you have any Thing to command me.

Luc. Do as ye please.

BETWEEN

Lucinda and Antonia.

Antonia. WHAT is your Pleasure with me, Aunt? Grace told me you wanted me.

Luc. What, Crying still ! Come wipe your Eyes, and lay by that Melancholly Look : I believe we talk'd till we were both too hot. I sent for you to take a Walk with me up the Orchard ; there is no Sun : I have something to say to you, that I know won't displease ye.

Ant. I'll wait on ye, Aunt.

Luc. Don't you know, Antonia, what an Antipathy I have against Men ? How mortally I detest the whole Sex ? And how carefully I have always endeavour'd to infuse the same Principles into you ?

Ant. Yes, Aunt, I do ; and I have often wonder'd, what Reason you could have to hate them so much ; because I have heard you say, that my Grandfather was such a Good Man ; and as to other Men, you always shunn'd their Conversation, and would seldom admit of any in your Company.

C

Luc. Tho'

Luc. Tho' I have not experienced them to my own Cost, I have done that which is more adviseable, taken Warning from the Miseries I saw 'em bring upon others; but of that hereafter, First, I would let ye know, that having that Aversion to Marriage, when your Mother was dead I look'd upon you and your Sister, as the only Heirs I was to have; and from that Time treated you both in every Respect, as if you had been my own Children. When your Aunt Clarinda died, you was between Eleven and Twelve Years Old, and began to shew so much Wit and Good Humour, so Easie and Obliging a Temper, that I will freely own it, Antonia, I thought no Body's Company so agreeable as yours: And what pleas'd me most, was, that though we differ'd so much in Years, you seem'd as fond of me, as I could be of you; was I in the Garden, you'd soon be there; if sometimes I had lock'd my self up in my Closet, 'twould not be long but I should have ye knock at the Door upon some Pretence or other; either to shew me your Work, or your Writing, or else to ask me some Pretty Question about what you had seen or read: Every Thing you did was delightful to me; but above all, nothing ravish'd me more than that I saw ye have that Ill Opinion of Men which they deserve: Whenever there was an Opportunity to rail at the Sex, you would exclaim against them with Indignation, and seem to have a Horror for the very Name.

Ant. I was but a Child then, Aunt.

Luc. No Matter what you was; I am sure you was in the right; and I wish, I could say the same of you now: But pray don't interrupt me. By the Hatred I thought you had conceived against

hanta

against Men, my Wishes were compleat, and I thought nothing but Death should ever part us. This Golden Age lasted till ye was past Fifteen; but then you alter'd visibly every Day: All on a sudden you grew very Neat, not the least Spot must be seen in your Cloaths; no Body could do up your Linnen, or starch your Lace, or Muslin, to please ye; and you hardly ever appear'd in an Undress: The Fashion was all your Discourse; and whatever Money you could get was laid out in Plays and Romances; a little after you grew a great Admirer of Country Dances; and though you had learn'd to sing, and to play on the Harpicord, yet there were some very Fine Tunes, that you could not learn without Instruction, and a Musick-master you must have; you know I allowed whatever you desir'd, for in all that I thought there was no great Harm. The First Time I suspected the Cause of your Change was one Evening in the Walks; I had often before observed, with Pleasure, that when we met any Men your Looks were so free and unconcern'd, that every one might see you neither fear'd, nor desired, to meet their Eyes; but that Evening I speak of, meeting a Gentleman, that was very well dressed, I happen'd to take Particular Notice of you; when he was yet a good Way off I saw you raise your Body, and by altering your Gate, assume a certain Firmness in your Steps, that was not usual; when he came near, the Stretching out of your Neck had pull'd up your Bubbies, which where then but just budding out; he look'd upon you very hard, you blush'd, and your Eyes, that look'd as if they had been newly varnish'd, were very steadfastly fix'd on the Ground.

Ant. What could be a greater Sign—

Luc. I don't say it to upbraid you with any Thing: Pray hear me out. When we were pass'd him, I said nothing to you, but presently took you home, and was more concern'd at what I had seen, than ever I had, been at any Thing since my Father died.

Ant. You thought perhaps it was a Gallant.

Luc. No Child, I thought the Truth; I thought, that Nature had been playing her Tricks, and told you what Mould you was made of; when the Presence of Men makes an Impression upon Women, it renders them uneasy, and sets their Imagination to work; it is a certain Sign, that their Aversion to Men is not long liv'd: After that Day, the more I examin'd into your Actions the more I found my Suspicion true: It was then that I strove with all my Power to divert your Thoughts, to allay the Heat of your Blood; I often perswaded you to Fasting; to prevent the Roving of your Fancy; I advised you to frequent Prayers, and the Reading of Pious Books. I foresaw Two Evils, that were equally dreadful to me, whenever you married: The First was, That you should become a Prey to Man, and consequently be made miserable by that Sex, which I so much abhorr'd. The Second, That I should lose the Company of what in all the World I valued most: But in spite of all my Endeavours, as your Wit and Beauty encreas'd, so did your Care in setting every Thing off to best the Advantage; you grew Cunning enough at last to find out, that every Charm I perceived in ye stab'd me to the Heart: This made you shun, and hate me; but the Real Cause, of what I said or did, was my Fear of losing you, and not my Envy, as you imagin'd.

imagin'd. I studied a Thousand Arguments to prove the Happiness of a Single Life; but very often, in the midst of them, your Stretching, your Short Sighs, your Seeming Weariness, the Languishing of your Wishing Eyes, your Abrupt Motions, and Sudden Starts, would so manifestly declare your Thoughts, as if you had openly told me, Your Reasons are false, for what I long for is not to be found in my self. About Seventeen you was at the Worst; then you never kept Two Minutes in one Posture: If you walk'd through the Room, it was with as much Faintness, as if your Back had been broke; and if you stood still, it was always leaning against something or other, and seldom on both Legs, whilst the Small of the one would be continually hitting the Calf of the other: A Hundred Pranks you would play with your Legs; when you sat down, the Heel of one Foot would always be rubbing and pressing the other's in Step: Sometimes when you thought you was not observ'd, how passionately would you throw yourself backward, and clapping your Legs alternatively over one another, squeeze your Thighs together with all the Strength you had, and in a Quarter of an Hour repeat the same to all the Chairs in the Room? Many Times, Antonia, have I seen you sit in that Careless Manner, and half shutting your Eyes, whilst your Head would slowly drop down to one Shoulder, bite on your Lip with so Craving, and so Begging a Look, that I have pitied you my self, and spoke, to make you think on something else: Every Action, and every Limb, betray'd your Desires, your Tongue only excepted; nay, I have often fear'd that that likewise would have been drawn into the Plot, and ask'd for Man as loud as they. The only Thing that kept up some Hopes in me was to see your Shiness for Men continue so long; by that I guess'd at your Discretion, because it shewed me that you knew the Danger; and to uphold it in you, I told ye Five Hundred Stories about Rapes of my own Invention: Your Vertue and Modesty I was persuaded of, but they could do me no good; I never fear'd any Thing base, I knew you had Pride enough to secure your Honour.

Ant. Dear Aunt, I can hold no longer; I never was more agreeably surpriz'd in all my Life than now: May I think you never suspected my Conduct? And that all the Faults you found were only an Artifice to keep my Underserving Company to your self? The small Gifts then, which Nature has bestow'd upon me, were never odious to you, and you never disliked them, but as you fear'd, they would be a Means to draw me from you: Is it possible that all that Passion, which I took for Spleen and Envy, was so much Generous Love thrown away upon an Unthinking Girl?

Luc. Can you doubt of it, Antonia? By Nature you are my Niece, by Adoption my Daughter: Look but back, and call to mind how tenderly I have brought ye up from your Infancy; how I hugg'd and cherish'd ye when you was a Child; and what Delight I took in ye? I shall never forget it, when you was about Eight Years Old, Somebody told ye one Day that it was vulgar to say Aunt, and Father and Mother; you should call me Madam: At which you seemed very angry, and said you would never call me so; And when they asked ye

spleen & envy

ye the Reason, you answered, Because you was sure, that Madam was not so loving a Word as Aunt. Don't ye remember, Antonia, how I took ye up in my Arms and kiss'd ye for it? How I told ye, you should always say, Aunt; and afterwards several Times enjoin'd, ye never to call me otherwise?

Ant. I do remember it, and am ashamed of my Stupidity.

Luc. Can you think I should look upon ye as my own, and dislike your Charms, if it was not for that Reason I mention'd? I have Eyes as well as others: You have your Share of Wit, and the Beauty of an Angel, Antonia; and all that have seen, or heard, ye, have wonder'd, that so much Discretion should be join'd with either. You don't know the Stratagems I have used to stifle the Addresses that have been made to me on your Behalf: But when after all my Care I saw, that skilfully you began to manage Wild Nature, and grew dextrous at covering your Eager Wishes with Art and Dissimulation, I found your fear of Man was vanished; you could speak to them without Blushing, and look 'em in the Face with seemingly no more Concern, than in your Primitive Innocence: Then I lost all my Hopes, and grew outrageous; I knew nothing would rouse ye more, than to question your Vertue; I would leave nothing untried; and this has been the Way, that of late, I have attacked ye, in hopes to work some Change. When, to Day, I had provoked ye so far, that I found ye shedding Tears, I was sorry, that I had said so much: At first I strove by Banter to recover ye; but when I saw you had left me, and was gone up to your Chamber, I could bear it no longer, had you called, and was resolved to reveal my Heart, and own every Thing, which I have told you since: Dear Niece, this is my Love's last Shift, I know I shall not keep you long.

Ant. Obliging Aunt, your Love is so uncommon, I can never repay it; what must I do to shew my Gratitude?

Luc. You know, my Child, let me enjoy your Company, stay with me, and never Marry.

Ant. Don't urge me to make a Promise, I would not be rash, I might repent it, tho' I declare I never was in Love with any Man yet.

Luc. If you had, I should soon have known it, for I have watch'd you narrowly.

Ant. Indeed you have Unmask'd my Soul, and trac'd my Thoughts through every Chink, and Cranny of my Heart: I own, all what you have said is true, but you shall not need any more take such Pains to search my Inclinations; henceforth I'll keep no Secret from you. I would not question your Wisdom, Aunt, but I wonder at one Thing; you say, I now look upon Man with as little Concern as before, then why should you think me further gone, since it was the Loss of that Unconcernedness, by which you first discovered, that Man had wrought upon my Imagination? I am certain, that I find not half that Disturbance in my Heart, when a Man comes near me, that I felt before; I can govern my Looks, bridle my Actions much better, and methinks I have almost regain'd the Empire of my self: Pray then, why do you judge that I am worse? I felt much greater Combustion

bustion within, than I do now, and I really believe the Danger is over.

Luc. You are mistaken, Niece, the greatest Danger lyes there, that you think it past: You must in this Case act, as a skilful Physician, and not always judge alike of the same Symptoms, tho' in the same Distemper; for, as the State of it differs, so they may portend either Good or Evil; when you was a Child, you was not concerned at the Sight of Man; because you was ignorant, and innocent; and then it was a Sign, that your Fancy was clear and free; but since that, every time you have seen or heard a Man, Nature has whispered to you, that you was a Woman: So that the Unconcernedness which now you shew, proceeds from quite another Cause. What disorders young Women so much at the Sight of Man, is the Conflict between their Natural Wishes, and the Inborn Modesty of Virgins: This Conflict being become Habitual to you, disturbs your Body not so visibly as it did. The Saylor in a Storm shews less Concern, and seems to be braver than the Soldier; not because he has more Courage, or fears Death less than the other; but because the Dangers of the Sea are more familiar to him. When the Difference that is between the Two Sexes, first begins to run in the Minds of Virgins, all Men are represented naked to their Imagination: This makes 'em so uneasy all over, that by every Action they betray what they equally wish and fear, till by often being in Man's Company, without receiving any Harm, at last they grow bolder. If a Cat would leave off killing, and walk quietly about the House, without hurting any any Creature, the very Mice would come and play with her.

Ant. I understand very well, whence this Concern, which upon the Account of Man, we shew at our first coming to Maturity, proceeds, and how by degrees it wears off, but I cannot perceive, why it should be bad to lose it. For blushing, and being out of Countenance, are no great Accomplishments, and those that are guilty of it, upon every slight Occasion, are counted very raw and foolish.

Luc. I never said it was bad to lose it, I wish you had lost it with all my Heart: I did not say you could now look on Man with no more Concern, than when you was a Child; but, seemingly with no more Concern. Whatever you like about Man, moves you perhaps more than ever, but that your Concern is less seen, is, because you have learn'd Cunning enough to hide it.

Ant. I confess, that every Thing Handsome affects me with more Thought than before; but then I am capable of examining, and taking every Thing to pieces; I can give my self time of considering, whether it be worth my liking or not; and I remember, that formerly, if my Eyes but glanced upon a Gentleman, it would put my Soul into such a Confusion, I could not rally my Thoughts for a good while after: I would not be in that Condition again for the World; and I cannot imagine, why you think, that now I have so much Government over my self, I am in a greater Danger, than I was, when I could contain neither Looks nor Limbs, and every Action betray'd my inward Wishes.

Luc. I'll tell you : As long as Maids cannot forbear shewing that Concern we speak of, when Men are near ; the continual Alarm keeps 'em so much upon their Guard, there is no Mischief to be fear'd ; their Fright is their Keeper ; the least Touch of a Man puts 'em into such a Consternation, as if Ravishing was the least Thing to be expected ; a Man cannot speak to 'em, but it throws their Senses in such a Hurry, and makes 'em think on so many Things at once, that they either hear 'em not at all, or so confusedly, that their Words can make but little Impression upon 'em. But when Women have acquired that Government over themselves, that you so much admire, then they are lost and gone, for then they can be calm, and hear a Man sedately ; then they'll sit down and hearken to Reason.

Ant. And should they not ?

Luc. No, by no means, never, if they would keep their Virginity unspotted : No, Niece, she that listens to them, is ruined, and her Liberty is lost. In Reasoning, Women can never cope with Men, they have a Thousand Advantages beyond us ; our Wit may be equal with theirs, but in every Thing else they exceed us, as well as in Strength of Body ; it is thought sufficient, if a Woman can but Read and Write, we receive no other Education, as to Learning : But where we leave off, they set out ; they are not trusted to manage their own Affairs, before they are sent to Schools, and Universities, to have their Intellectuals mended and sharpened ; not by one Master, or by ordinary Men, but by several, that are picked and culled out of Thousands, for excelling every one one in his own Profession; here they have the Quintessence of Arts and Sciences, Politicks, and Worldly Cunning infused into them; and for Seven or Eight Years, all manner of Knowledge, as it were, beat into their Brain, with all the Application imaginable, whilst we are pricking a Clout. Why should we venture then, (their Head-pieces being so much better furnished than ours,) to hold Arguments, or to Parley with them? What is short and plain we understand perhaps as well as they; but when Business is too Intricate, or of too long a Coherence, 'tis beyond our Reach: Women are shallow Creatures; we may boast of Prattling, and be quick at a Jest, or Repartee, but a sound and penetrating Judgment only belongs to Men, as the Masters of Reason and solid Sense.

Ant. I am amazed to hear you speak so well of them, I never knew you say any Thing in their Praise before.

Luc. But, Niece, tho' I give the Devil his Due, I still despise him. I tell you this, because you should not slight your Enemy, but knowing his Strength, and your own Weakness, always be upon your Guard, and never trust them. What must become of a Besieged Town, if the Garrison should Mutiny, for want of what the Besiegers court 'em to accept of? What signifies the Wisdom, or the Bravery of the Governour? He must either Surrender, or be knock'd down: Thus it is with a Maid, that Man lays Siege to; what Confidence can she have in her Reason, when she feels that her own Wishes within betray and overpower it?

Ant. Considering the Hatred you have conceived against the Sex, I can't expect you should talk otherwise, than you do : I own that there is something in my Heart, that pleads for Man in general, but I am well satisfied it is not so strong as to hinder me, from duly weighing, what is said to me, and examining every Circumstance: Had I been attacked Two Years ago, I was then of so little Defence, and I had so many Mutinies within, tho' never a Foe appeared, that I could have made but a weak Resistance; but I am much Fortified since, and the Garrison is kept in so good a Discipline, that I don't question but I should be able to hold out a whole Season, against the boldest and subtlest Warriour of 'em all, and never yield, but on such Terms, as the generality of the World should approve of, as well as my self. 'Tis true, I never had an Inclination hitherto to be a Nun, yet, as I told you, my Heart is free, and I am nowhere engaged: I am but Nineteen Years Old, and to show you that I am in no haste, for the Sake of your extraordinary Love of my Company, so much beyond my Deserts, and the Esteem with which you are pleased to Honour me, I promise you, Aunt, that whenever I intend to enter upon Matrimony, as long as you are alive, I shall give you a whole Twelvemonth's Warning beforehand.

Luc. Dear Niece, I thank you, but will all this be for my Sake only? Would you not do it as well, because you should love to be Courted a great while?

Ant. No, indeed, I do it First, that we may have both time enough to prepare our selves for Parting;

Parting ; and Secondly, that you may have Leisure, when we shall both know the Party, to examine his Circumstances, pry into his Conduct, and inform me of those Faults and Inconveniences, which I perhaps might overlook ; tho', I believe, that among the rest of the Vanities of the World, it is none of the most disagreeable, to see one of those Noble Creatures, as you have described just now, that are endued with so much Wisdom, and Knowledge, make their Addresses to us with so much Submission, and Humble themselves at our Feet.

Luc. What your Opinion of Wooing may be, I can't tell, but I always thought it very ridiculous ; tell me, pray, Antonia, which is more unaccountable, the Pride of the Woman, or the Humility of the Man ? She is resolved to be very cross, and with abundance of Coyness sits in State, insults over the Man, and treats him with as much Scorn, as if he was not worthy to wipe her Shoes ; and why does she do all this ? For no other Reason, but because she designs to make him her Master, and give him all she has in the World. The Man, on his Side, takes all these Indignities in good Part, seems to be fond of being ill treated, and with the most profound Veneration to his Idol, begs on his Knees, that a certain modest Petition may be granted him ; the Upshot of which is, that the Person, to whom he pays his Devotion, would be so kind, as to oblige herself solemnly, before Witnesses, upon the Penalty of being damn'd, to be his Slave as long as she lives, unless he should happen to die before her.

Ant. We

Ant. We may discant on these Things as we please; but as that Longing and Fondness, which the Males and Females of all other Creatures, are observed, to have for one another at certain Times, were, without doubt, design'd as a Means, by which, to their Mutual Satisfaction, they should perpetuate their Kind: So it would be very strange, that Nature should have given the same Desire to Men and Women for no other Reason, than to try their Cunning and Discretion in stifling and hiding of them before each other.

Luc. No Body ever said so: The same Appetites were given to all for the same Purpose; nay, the Rational Ones seem rather more Influenced by them than others: For though the Women have, besides the Use of their Reason, an Innate Reservedness, and a Kind of Horror, against losing their Virginity more than the Females of any other Creature; yet there is hardly one in Fifty, unless they die in the Prime of their Age, but what complies before she is Forty.

Ant. Then what can be more reasonable, than to strike in with so great a Majority, as Nine and Forty to One?

Luc. I own it, it is a Good Excuse; but you'll find it far from being an Argument, that it is the Wisest Course: For granting, that among Fifty Women in Years, there is but One, that has withstood this Provocation of Nature, and has kept her Virginity, we can conclude nothing, unless first we examine the Old Maids, how they have throve, and how they like their being Single at Long-run; and afterwards look into the vast Numbers of those that would not be at that Trou-

Trouble, and have tried the Experiment as well as their Mothers; and see likewise, how Marriage has agreed with them.

Ant. With all my Heart, Aunt; and if I don't produce more Married Women, that shall speak in Praise of it in this small Town, than there are Old Maids in all the County, I'll be bound to keep my Maidenhead till I wear Spectacles.

Luc. Not so fast, Niece, what! You would bring me some giddy-brain'd Things, that knew nothing of the World, before they Married, and have not had Leisure yet to reflect on any Thing, but which Way to gratifie their Appetites, which first enslaved them. If you would come to a fair Trial, you must take your Married Women of the same Age with the Maids, and, if you do so, you will not find One in Five Hundred, but what has repented a Thousand Times, that ever she submitted to the Yoak: Whilst all the Old Maids, as soon as that troublesome Itch is over, rejoice at having kept their Liberty, and agree unanimously in the Comforts of a Single Life.

Ant. To this I have Two Things to say, the first is, that some People have preserved their Virginity; because they never had an Opportunity, handsomely, to dispose of it; and that consequently they ought not to boast of it.

Luc. There are no Women so ordinary, or ill shaped, but there are Men as ugly, and deformed; dirty Puddings for dirty Dogs; none can be troubled with the Burden long, if they care not, which Way they get rid of it; but as for

for the Women that you speak of, that would rather, than not handsomely dispose of it, let it alone, they deserve abundance of Praise, and have as much Honour as any.

Ant. Why, pray?

Luc. Because such a one shews, that she has all along remain'd Mistress of her Choice, and preserv'd a Discretion, which no Married Woman can boast of.

Ant. How! Are there not Women enough, that, after having refused several good Matches, chuse the best at last?

Luc. Yes, but they can't prove by that, how discreet they would have been afterwards, if they had not accepted of the last, as they did. So much for your First Objection; what is your Second?

Ant. The Second is, that considering the Inconstancy and Discontentedness of Humane Nature, which always make us repine and grumble at our present Condition, it is very likely, that Thousands of Women, who have often rashly repented that ever they were Married, would upon a more serious Reflection upon the Passages of their Lives, the Fruits of Wedlock, and other Circumstances that have attended it, change their Note at last; and instead of bewailing the Loss of their Virginity, not wish for the World, but that they had parted with it, as they did.

Luc. This indeed is very true, and as well observed: Therefore, leaving them to the Fickleness of their own Minds, let us not trouble our Heads with what they say, or think of themselves, and whether their Repentance be real must be a person who will master of a man (34)

at bottom, or whether their Fondness to their Brats, makes 'em forget all Miseries, only steadfastly look into the Merits of the Cause, and see, what a Rational and Unconcerned Stander-by ought to judge of them, as to their happy or unhappy State. Name me a Woman of Fifty or Threescore, that was in your Circumstances, and about your Age when she Married, in whose Condition you would desire to be, if you should live to be so old: I won't stand upon a Year or Two, or a Thousand Pound more or less.

Ant. I am too Young, to know what Ladies, that are now of that Age, were, when Unmarried; but I can tell you, in whose Place I could wish to be, if I was so Old.

Luc. Take care, you are well acquainted with the History of her Life, or else, how shall we judge of the Comforts and Disgraces that have attended it?

Ant. What do you think of Aurelia?

Luc. Think of her! She is a very good Humour'd, Comely, Woman.

Ant. But I mean as to her Living happily.

Luc. She lives extraordinary well indeed.

Ant. Don't you think it is almost an un-conceivable Pleasure for a Woman, to have so Charming a Creature for an only Daughter, as she has, and to see her so well disposed of.

Luc. How well, Child?

Ant. How well! To a Baronet, a Gentleman of Three Thousand a Year; that has settled a Thousand Pound a Year upon her; is that not well disposed of? At least it is more than answerable to her Fortune; for she gave but Five Thousand Pound with her: Now, Aunt, her Virginitie never could have help'd her to this, no more than those Four delicate Babes, her Grand-children; the eldest Boy, I think is the finest Child that ever I beheld with my Eyes: These are no fading Fopperies, or foolish Vanities, but real and substantial Blessings of the first Rate.

Luc. How long have you known Aurelia?

Ant. I remember her ever since her Daughter was about such another as our Camilla, I believe I could not be above Five or Six Years Old; she always kept a Coach, and a Footman. she has a Gardener, and Three or Four Maid Servants; her House in Town is very well Furnished, and so is this here: She keeps a good Table/under her, her Servants seem to live very easie, and yet you shall not name a better ordered Family. Easier

Luc. Have you ever heard any thing of her Husband?

Ant. Nothing, but that he died many Years ago: To do, what she does, there is no doubt, but that he left her very well; and she won't speak ill of Matrimony sure.

Luc. I would never have you talk of more than you know, Antonia. I remember Aurelia when she was yet in Hanging-sleeves, and I a Woman grown: And since you have named her for your Pattern, if you'll give me leave, to begin from the bottom, and enlarge upon it a little,

tle, I'll tell you what I have known of her since.

Ant. I shall think it very diverting.

Luc. Then we must defer it till to Morrow, for it will take up some Time.

Ant. What you please, Aunt.

end of

THE THIRD
DIALOGUE

BETWEEN

Lucinda and Antonia.

Lucinda. YOU are up very early Niece.

Antonia. I saw it was a fine Morning, and hearing you cough in the Garden, I began to think on your Promise.

Luc. Do you mean the History of Aurelia's?

Ant. Yes, Aunt.

Luc. Then sit down; I am ready: Aurelia's Father was a Welchman, but had been sent up to London very young; after having served his Time with a Shoemaker, and been a Journeyman some Years, he Married a Widow of the same Trade; how long they lived together I can't well tell; but by Saving and Industry they had Prospered so well, that when she died, he left off his Shoemaker's Shop by degrees, and turned Leatherseller: Two or Three Years after the Death of his Wife, by whom he had no Children, he Married a Second, the only Child of a Tanner, who, tho' he had bred her but meanly, had left her above a Thousand Pound, when he died. This was the Mother of Aurelia, whose Father was now a Considerable Dealer: When the Daughter, of whom they were extraordinary fond, came to be Eight or Nine Years Old, the Husband and Wife often quarrell'd about her Education; till at last the Father, seeing that neither of 'em could make a great Hand of it; carried her to a Boarding-School, and told the Mistress of it; that, tho' he looked Plain, he was a Rich Man, and would value no Money, so he could but have his Daughter made as Fine a Lady as any was in the Land. So Aurelia received all the Learning a good Boarding-School could help her too; and, whilst she was there, in a few Years, her Father thriv'd so well, that, before she was Sixteen, he design'd her a Portion of Ten Thousand Pound, if he liked the Man. The Noise of such a Fortune to a Genteel, Handsome, Young Woman, whose Father and Mother were yet both alive, and never had had, and consequently were not likely now to have any other Children, could not but draw abundance of Suitors. The Father, who never had minded any Thing but getting of Money, as soon as Aurelia was come to live at Home, began to take Notice of the World, set up his Coach, and was very proud in carrying his Daughter about for a Shew. One Day coming from Hide Park, Aurelia fell in Love with a Gentleman she saw on Horseback: Dorante, for that was his Name, as he was prancing and staring about, happen'd to throw his Eyes that Way, and meeting with hers, found so much Disorder in her Countenance, that, having a good Opinion of himself, he presently suspected the Cause, he sent a Porter to follow the Coach, and being informed of her Name, and Circumstances, writ to her very passionately the next Day ; she answered presently, and thus a Love Intrigue began : Mean while the Old Man, having no other Notion of making his Daughter Happy, than by making her Rich, had pitch'd upon a Son-in-Law, that had a vast Estate, but was very deformed, and flighting the Aversion which he perceived his Daughter had against him, granted Access to nobody but him. Dorante not being Bashful, as soon as he was sure of his Mistress's Approbation, went directly to her Father, and told him his Errand : He was a Tall, Well-made, Proper, Man, and Aurelia's Father seeing a Gentleman of his Mien, well Dress'd, with a Couple of Footmen in good Liveries to attend him, received him very civilly. Dorante, being ask'd the necessary Questions, told him with a great Assurance, that he was a Gentleman of only a Thousand a Year yet, but that he had greater Expectations : As for his Country, that it was Ireland, where he was of a great Family ; some of which perswaded him, as the first Step to Preferment, to accept of a Company in a Regiment of Foot. The Old Man, very uneasy at the Words, Ireland, and Company, gave him a short Answer, said, his Daughter was too Young to think of any such Thing yet, and desired the Captain to forbear his Addresses. Dorante would not be put by so ; he knew Aurelia's Mind, and, by means of Bribing her Maid, often saw the Mistress : Whilst the Father, bearing no great Love to Dorante's Profession, was much alarm'd at his Irish Proposal, thought all Delays dangerous, and preaching nothing but Passive Obedience, and Non-resistance to his Daughter, press'd her hard to think well of his Choice : She defending herself with the same Argument of her Youth, which he had used to the Captain, made a vigorous Opposition, and was so constant in her Refusal; that her Father, who was of an obstinate, wilful Temper, seeing her so resolute, began to be rough with her, told her he would be obey'd, and being very covetous, resolved to make use of all his Authority, to force her Inclinations, and rather Marry her by Violence, than miss of so rich a Prize: He look'd upon Dorante as a Man, not to be dash'd by the first Denial, and fearing he might make some other Attempt, was very watchful, and in a little Time discovered, by an intercepted Letter, his Daughter's Passion: Being a Cholerick Man, he ran up where she was, in a great Rage, and beat her most unmercifully: When Night came, he lock'd her up, and treated her with so much rigour for several Months, that at last she fell Sick; and when nobody expected she would live, the Father, repenting of his Severity, only shew'd abundance of Sorrow; but the Mother, who had been always over-fond, resolved to try a more effectual Remedy; and knowing Dorante to be the Cause, sends for him to her Daughter: She observ'd, the Sight of him had reviv'd Aurclia, and unknown to her Husband procur'd him several Visits: Whether the Distemper was at the highest, or that Dorante's Presence wrought the Cure, she mended visibly after: But when both the Father and Mother thought her recovered, she was lost at once: For one Morning, the Maid not finding her in her Chamber, went to look for her in that of her Mother's, but not being there neither, the House was soon in an Uproar; search was made everywhere, but no Daughter heard of: Six Days after there came a Letter, Sign'd

Dorante

Dorante and Aurelia, that acquainted them with their being Married at Chester, from whence they were to go the next Morning to Nesson, in order to Embark for Ireland.

This News, you must think, surpriz'd them much. The Father was so terrible angry, that, without examining any further, he wish'd a Thousand Curses might light on Dorante's Head, and made as Horrid Imprecations against his Daughter: The Mother cry'd bitterly; and in bewailing of her Loss, she was so imprudent, that, among many Lamentations, more loud than coherent, she dropp'd some Words, by which her Husband understood, that during his Daughter's Sickness, Dorante had often seen her by the Mother's Consent: This provok'd him worse than the rest, and discharging all his Fury upon the Poor Woman, he kick'd her about the House like a Foot-ball, and with all the Billingsgate of Old Bawds, and Salt Bitches, damning his Wife, and sinking his Daughter, raved like a Madman; till at last being wearied with this, he made a Solemn Vow, and wish'd for Damnation, if ever he should own again, either the one, or the other. He was as good as his Word; for that same Night he turn'd his Wife out of Doors: As for Aurelia, he would never so much as kearken to any Body that pretended to speak in her Behalf. The Mother was taken in by a Kind Relation; but she troubled him not long; for overwhelm'd with Grief, what with the Running away of her Daughter, and what with the Brutality of her Husband, she was immediately seiz'd with a Fever, and, without ever hearing any more of either, dead, and buried, in less than a Fortnight. Her Husband having made

made a Will, by which he wholly excluded his Daughter, outliv'd her not much above Three Years; at the end of which he ran distracted, and died quickly after, left above Fifty Thousand Pound to a Stranger. I know you are a Critick, Antonia, don't you think my Tale tedious?

Ant. No indeed, Aunt; far from it.

Luc. I was afraid you thought me long; because one should not be so particular in Circumstances, that are immaterial to the Plot, and foreign from the End to which a Story is told.

Ant. I have heard nothing, but what was very material: Others perhaps would have thought it sufficient, in regard to what befel Aurelia, if they had only said, that she fell in Love with an Irish Captain. with whom, after being Married against her Parents Consent, she stole away into his own Country: But by this Aurelia would have been much wrong'd; for though she was guilty of great Folly and Indiscretion at first, yet her latter Conduct has been much justified by the Mechanick Spirit, and Brutish Nature, of the Father, as well as the little Prudence of the Mother; of both which I could not have had so full, and so clear a Notion, if you had left out the least Circumstance: As to the End, for which a Story is told, I think you have pursu'd yours very artfully; for I suppose your Meaning is first to shew that Aurelia had not been so happy as I thought for; and then, that Marriage was the Cause of her Misfortunes, in order for me to avoid it: And which way could this be done better than by being diffusive in the Ill Consequences of Love in general?

Luc. You

Luc. You have made it out so well, that if People should hear us, they would think, I made Blunders on purpose, that you might shew your Wit in bringing me off.

Ant. I rather believe, Aunt, they would say, you banter'd your Poor Niece, and pretended those Things to be Errors, which in reality you knew to be Beauties, on purpose to try whether she would be Fool enough to say so too.

Luc. You are an Unlucky Baggage.

Ant. But I am impatient to know, what Treatment Aurelia receiv'd from Dorante afterwards: May I desire you to go on?

Luc. With all my Heart.

Ant. But pray don't be more concise; for it is so entertaining, I am afraid I sha'n't have enough of it.

Luc. I'll please you, if I can. The Contents of the Letter, which was sent to Aurelia's Father, were very true: They made what haste they could for Ireland, and after a short and easy Passage, arrived safely at Dublin; where they staid in Expectation of hearing from London. But before I proceed any further, I am to acquaint you with several Things concerning Dorante. He was a Man well Born, and well Bred, he had studied tolerably well; and tho' his Parents always liv'd in the Country, been chiefly brought up in Dublin. He had a Gentleman-like Skill in most Exercises, of which his Master-piece was riding the Great Horse. When he was Young, his Father died worth Two Hundred and Fifty Pounds a Year, of which, Fifty were his Wife's Jointure: He never had more than Two Children, Dorante and his Sister; and that his Son's Estate might not be incumincumber'd, by his Frugality he had saved Five Hundred Pounds, which were carefully laid up for his Daughter. On his Death-bed he left every Thing under the Tuition of his Wife, with a great Charge, that Dorante should have all the Education bestow'd upon him, that he should be capable of receiving; which she faithfully perform'd. About half a Year after Dorante had been of Age, and possessed of his Estate, he came for England: He was Generous and Bold, more Cunning than Witty, and set out with very few Faults. and of them a little Conceit, and an Itch to Romancing, were the worst, though not very conspicuous; but coming to Court, which was then very debauch'd, he quickly became as those he conversed with. From the very first he never had an Inclination for any Company but what liv'd above him; and seeing that, at the Rate he began his Expences, Two Hundred a Year would go but a very little Way, he presently took up some Money, and mortgaged Part of his Estate: He was a great Lover of Tennis; and being no Bad Player, won a pretty deal at it, not so much by his Skill, as his Dexterity in hiding it, and covering his Play: From this he was brought to other Gaming; and being fortunate, in a little Time saw himself Master of a Considerable Sum. Puffed up with Success, he look'd upon his Estate as a Trifle, and not troubling his Head with paying off what he owed upon it, raised his Hopes very high, and with them his Expences. As Gaming occasions the keeping of ill Hours, and that abundance of Vices, so, being flush in the Pocket, he soon fell in with Whoring and Drinking, and began to be, what that hateful Sex calls, a Good Companion.

It was an Age in which nothing went down but Pastime and Pleasure, and few Vertues were allowed of, but Valour and Good Humour. Dorante had not been long in Town, but found an Opportunity to let the World see, that he wanted neither; for happening to meet with Two Quarrels, the first with one that was Famous for Fighting, the Second with a Man of a great Estate, but a noted Coward, he behaved himself with as much Bravery, and Evenness of Temper in the one, as he shew'd Knowledge, in point of Honour and good Breeding in the other; and as there is not any Thing, that makes a Man more known than a Duel, especially if it be with one of Distinction, and procures him greater Applause than the Managing of it with Discretion as well as Courage, so these Two Rencounters, falling out not long from one another, gain'd him no small Reputation, and in less than a Twelve-month Dorante had a General Acquaintance at Whitehall, and was everywhere esteem'd, and as well receiv'd. Thus far the Prospect is fair enough, but now we have seen the best Part of him; for Fortune not favouring always alike, and himself being extravagant, he first ran out what he had in ready Cash, then Selling the best Part of his Estate, whilst the Remainder was deeply engaged, before he was Five and Twenty he was reduced to a very low Ebb. If he could have lived upon Two or Three Hundred a Year, the Tennis-Court might have maintain'd him; but not being able to be without Horses, and Two or Three Servants, and being expensive in his Pleasures, when all his Substance was gone, he was forc'd to betake himself to several Shifts: He ran in Everybody's Debt, he borrow'd row'd Money of all he knew, and being no more shamefaced than any of his Country, never went without any Thing, that was to be had for asking. Notwithstanding all this, he was generally bare; till considering at last that Gaming had been the chief Cause of his Ruin, and more than suspecting that he had not always lost upon the Square, he resolv'd to try if Luck could not be forc'd, and begun with great Application to study the Cunning Part of Play; that is, to be more plain, turn Sharper. This prov'd a very Profitable Trade the First Year, and brought him a Good Revenue. To keep up his Credit, as Money came in, he paid off most of his Debts, always keeping to the same Rule which I have been told they follow at the Navy; the small Ships first. Dorante was very industrious, and pick'd up new Bubbles every Day; among others, that had the Misfortune to fall into his Hands, it was reported that a Person of Quality, whom he had got to himself, lost a larger Sum of Money than suited with his Conveniency to pay presently. The Nobleman ask'd Time; in the granting of which, after a very Courteous Manner, Dorante shew'd himself so obliging, that the other, about a Fortnight after, to let him see that he had taken Notice of his Civility, and thought himself beholden to him, came one Morning to Dorante, and told him, that he had a Company of Foot to dispose of; if it was worth his while, it should be at his Service. Never was any Proffer more acceptable to Dorante than this: With a Thousand Protestations, as we may suppose, of being his Lordship's most Humble and Devoted Servant for ever, he struck the Iron whilst whilst it was hot, and with Gratitude in his Countenance, laying hold of the Opportunity, he had his Commission sign'd the next Day.

Ant. I wonder, since Dorante had found out so beneficial a Calling, he should be so overjoy'd at this: Methinks, he might have been afraid, that one Day or other it would draw him from Court, where his Pleasure as well as his Livelihood lay.

Luc. It was in Time of Peace, and Officers did what they pleas'd: Besides, it was an Admirable Cloak to shelter under. Dorante understood the World entirely well; he knew that a Man of no Employ, or any Visible Income, than appears and lives like a Gentleman, and makes Gaming his Constant Business, is always suspected of not playing for Diversion only; and in short, of knowing and practising more than he should do. He likewise foresaw, that his Gains would not be always the same; it was possible he might be found out, or if not, by fleecing great Numbers every Body would shun him in Time. He was very glad of having this Certainty to trust to; and Money coming in daily, he had a Thought of recovering that Part of his Estate, that was not quite gone: He was now grown more sedate, and leaving off several Extravagant and Idle Ways of spending, became very provident to what he us'd to be. He was a great Lover of Women, and as he was resolved to leave nothing unattempted, that might turn to Profit, knowing himself to be a Handsome, Clean, Fellow, fell to Intriguing, and by this Means often made a Penny of the Pleasures which before he used to pay for. But notwithstanding, that he had so many Ways of getting ting and saving, nothing ever prosper'd with him: Sharping was very advantageous to him the First Year, as I told ye, but after that it fell by degrees; for though he had never been taken in any Faſt, yet by ſtripping ſo many, ſeveral that had been under his Clutches began to have an ill Opinion of him; and it was not long, but Capt. Dorante had a very bad Reputation. But the Chief Thing that always kept him Poor was, that he had ſuch a Prodigious Itch to Gaming, and Fortune was ſo little his Friend, that whenever he had got any Thing by Foul Play, he could ſeldom reſt before he loſt it again fairly at the Groomporters, or other Places, where he knew his Tricks would not paſs. This was the Character, and theſe were the Circumſtances of Dorante, when Aurelia ſaw him firſt, and fell ſo ſuddenly in that Fond and Unruly Paſſion, which nothing could excuſe her in, but her Youth, and little Experience.

An. No, nor they neither, I think.

Luc. What you ſay is true, Niece: But it is no more than what I have often obſerved of a Boarding-school Education; there they may be taught to Sing and Dance, to Work and Dreſs, and, if you will, receive Good Inſtructions for a Genteel Carriage, and how to be Mannerly; but theſe Things chiefly concern the Body, the Mind remains un-inſtructed: They lead Eaſie and Lazy Lives, and have abundance of Time upon their Hands, eſpecially thoſe whoſe Relations are rich and fooliſh enough to furniſh them with as much Money as may enable them to bribe their Teachers to neglect their Duty, and wink at their Faults, and by cramming themſelves with Cuſtards and Cheeſcakes all Day long, oblige their Miſtreſs with having no Stomach to their Dinner. I have often taken notice, how they have run together in Shoals, whispering and hugging one another, and standing still between whiles, all at once set up a Laughter with so much Loudness, and so many Grimaces, as if they were tickled to Death; and all this occasioned by some silly, naughty Word, they have got by the end; perhaps a baudy Monosyllable, such as Boys write upon Walls, which they have seen in coming from Church, and is often all they bring Home: It is incredible to unthinking People, how the tender Fancies of those young Chits are wounded, and really debauch'd, where there is such a Parcel of 'em together; you may see by their Actions, when they begin to know what they are made of: The bigger Misses separate from the rest, and treat the smaller Fry, either with so much Scorn out of Sight, or else with so much Womanliness, and affected Motherly Care, before your Face, as shews, they think themselves very knowing and experienced Ladies, in regard to the other: All the Week long they are commonly barr'd from the Sight of Man, Sundays excepted; some are arch, most of 'em wanton, and when they grow up, all fill one another's Heads with so much Rubbish of Courtship, and Love, that it is a wonder they don't run away with the first Man they see.

Ant. You don't take it ill, I hope, that they are hindred from conversing with Men.

Luc. I would not, if either the same Reservedness was to continue, or else, that their Friends had Husbands ready for them at the Gates, when they take 'em away: But I think it very dangerous, to have 'em kept from the Sight of Man, during their Childhood, till they are ripe, and ready to run mad for 'em, and then at once to thrust 'em in the midst of 'em: It is a much greater Happiness for Young Ladies to be Educated in a private Family.

Ant. But most People are of Opinion, that Strangers, who who always keep Children at a distance, and such, as by long Experience have learn'd to correct, as well as penetrate into the several Humours of 'em, are more likely to do Good with them, than indulging Parents, or others at Home, that being too fond of 'em, or else too familiar with them, seldom can keep 'em in Awe.

Luc. This only takes Place in such Parents as Aurelia had, that being ill-bred People themselves, and unable to rule their own Passions, could never be fit to Govern others : I would have Girls bred under the Government of a Prudent Mother, or other near Relations that's vertuous, has seen the World, and been brought up well herself: From such a one it is to be hoped, that by frequently exhorting them to their Duty, and early arming them against Temptation, she shall warn them against the Snares and artful Assaults of treacherous Man; till by seasonable Admonitions, and serious Discourses, their wild Desires shall be curb'd, and their Minds render'd as cautious and discreet, as their Behaviour is genteel and agreeable : 'Tis not to be thought that a Stranger, who only for a Livelihood, studies which Way to please young Misses, and their Friends, at the cheapest Rate, should take so much Pains; neither can that Care be expected from a Woman, tho' never so willing, that having all Day long Forty or Fifty of them about her Ears, and tired with the Noise, is glad to be rid of 'em, and as soon as Teaching-time is over, must mind her own Business. I hope you'll pardon this long Digression.

Ant. I shall always hear with Pleasure any Thing that puts me in mind of the Obligation I owe you.

Luc. Having told you before what befel Aurelia from her first seeing of Dorante, till her coming to Ireland, I'll step back to Dublin, where we left 'em both. Dorante judging, by the Probability of Things, did not question, but they should have Letters within a Fortnight from Aurelia's Parents, in Answer to what they they writ from Chester; but, not hearing one Syllable from 'em, he grew uneasy; for tho' Aurelia was a charming young Creature, that loved him to Distraction, Dorante could never be happy, unless he enjoy'd that, for which he had Courted her; it was not a Wife, but Money, he wanted: When Six Months were expired, and yet no News come, his Fears would often, when he was reflecting on the Stubbornness and Brutality of the Father, suspect that which was the real Cause; but when again he considered Aurelia's being an only Child, the great Wealth of the Father, and the Fondness of the Mother, he could not but think, that tho' their Anger might last for Nine or Ten Months, since what was done could not be revoked, they would be reconciled at the end, and consequently, that his Fortune was establish'd for ever. From the first Day he was come to Ireland, he took up with the same Trade he had followed before, and being yet unknown as to his Character, it turn'd to better Account than it had done of late in England. As to Aurelia, Dorante had so many winning Ways, where he design'd to please, and had so entirely gain'd her Heart, that all her Joys and Wishes only Centring in her Husband, and herself wanting for nothing, she lived very contentedly for some Time. Many People had been employed about her Father, every Thing had been tried to soften his Heart, and nothing had been neglected that was Moving: But when Dorante saw, that after a Trial of Two Years, neither Letters nor Friends could get any Access to him, and that, as I have told you, he would never so much as hear any Thing in his Daughter's Behalf, then he began to despair, and repent of his Bargain. Hitherto they had lived tolerably well, and Dorante had play'd the kind Husband, at least in outward Shew; but now he began to be surley, every Thing offended him at Home, and all the fond Love, and Submissiveness of Aurelia, could hardly keep him from being mischievous, he would not have been so bad, if his Harvest had continued ; but after he had been a Year and a half in Ireland, he began to be suspected ; and an ill Report being once spread of him, as the Place was smaller, so he became in a little time more notorious where he was, than ever he had been, whence he came. They had one Child, and Aurelia was ready to lye-in of another, the Charges encreased, and his Pay as Captain could not maintain himself, and his Family, tho' he forgot nothing, of what by false Musters, or robbing of his Men, could be squeez'd out of the Company. Dorante, who ever since he had followed his Infamous Courses, had loved nothing, but for his own Sake, nor valued any Thing at a higher Price, than the Money he could make of it, would come to ; as soon as his Wife, who had been brought to Bed of a Girl, got up again, threw his Eyes on her Beauty, and was resolved, if one Way he could not get Money with her, he would have it another : When Cash grew low at first, he had the better to support his Extravagancies abroad ; pinched his Wives usual Allowance, and stinted the Family at Home ; but no sooner was this Hellish Project framed, but to carry on his Design, he presently, not only allow'd her more, but likewise alter'd his Humour, bought her new Cloaths, and treated her again as civilly as ever. The poor Woman, ravish'd to see this Change, shew'd her Joy and Satisfaction with all the endearing Expressions that Love or Gratitude could invent. One Day talking by themselves, after a diverting Discourse, he smilingly look'd upon her with great Attention, commended her Face, and in a Lover's Phrase, taking notice of every particular Grace and Feature that was handsome in it, he kiss'd her, and putting her in mind of several Pleasures past, repeated with a great deal of Mirth, some agreeable Passages, at the Remembrance of which she could not forbear blushing ; when the Blood had tainred her Cheeks, and he thought her moved, laying hold of her Neck, and staring in her Eyes,

Eyes, My Dear Aurelia, says he, thou hast Charms enough to be the Mistress of a King; and in the same Breath, extolling the Generosity of a Person of the First Quality, that was Noted for Lewdness and Inconstancy, told her, his Fortune was made if she would not oppose it. Aurelia, who never had one Single Thought that had roved from Dorante, since she had seen him first, being as much in Love with him as ever, neither minded what Man he prais'd, nor the Infernal Plot he was contriving against her Honour; and thinking nothing was couch'd under his Words, but some Kind Pretty Turn of Vertuous Love, remain'd in the same Posture, and reply'd, looking with all the Kindness she was capable of; Can my Dorante doubt of being happy, when ever it shall be in his Aurelia's Power to make him so? He bid her be as good as her Promise, and after few Words more went out, and left her extraordinary well pleas'd with having seen her Husband in so Contented and Loving a Humour. In the Evening he came back, and carried her to the Play, where seeing the Nobleman he spoke of, he dwelled a long while on his Wit, and other Good Qualities. For Three or Four Days he hardly left her an Hour, and continued giving her all the Pleasure he could think of; but the Substance of all the Discourse he entertain'd her with, was a Panegyrick upon all Manner of Vice and Prophaneness, ridiculing the Sinsfulness of Adultery and unlawful Love; preaching up for all Obscenity, and making use of the same Arguments, as if he had been debauching another Man's Wife: He told her, how little he could ever be guilty of Jealousie; and that Friends might be communicative in every Thing that it must be a great Churl, or a Fool, that should like his own Garden the worse, because another had been there, tho' he had robb'd it of nothing, nor left so much as a Footstep behind him: As for his Part, he thought no more Harm in it, than in drinking with a Man out of the same Cup. Aurelia was but Young, for tho' by this Time

Time she had Two Children, she was not Nineteen yet ; and being thus prepared, was brought to the Person her Husband had promis'd her to. Dorante, who was with her, had order'd her not to be starch'd, but merry and free, and appear as gay as she could ; and after having staid a little while, pretending he was sent for upon an Extraordinary Occasion, he withdrew, and left her, promising to come again presently ; but return'd not till it was late, and Time to go home. The Company parted, and in a Month's Time the Gallant had often the same Opportunity of Aurelia's Conversation by her Husband's procuring : She had a Good Voice, and Danced very well, and his Lordship, who had liked her more than any he knew when he had only seen her, now charm'd likewise with her Company, began really to love her. His Courtship was very troublesome to Aurelia ; she shew'd her Husband that it was not without Reluctancy whenever she was forc'd to see him ; Dorante telling her that he would not for the World disoblige him, she suffer'd him to say what he pleas'd, and gave it a Hearing : But both the Spark, and the Husband seeing they could gain no Ground upon her, the latter one Day resolv'd to try more Effectual Means, and promising his Lordship, that he should be satisfied, desir'd him to come to his House the next Morning early. Now, Antonia, something follows that is not so very proper for Virgins to hear.

Ant. Why not, Aunt, as long as there is Nobōdy here but you and I ?

Luc. Then I'll study to wrap it up as well as I can, but I would rather drink Coffee first, before I go on any further.

Ant. Pray, Aunt, let us taste of that Fine Chocolate that was sent you Yesterday.

Luc. That is not good for you.

Ant. You told me often, that nothing which is wholesome is bad for People in Health ; and I am very well.

Luc. You may do it for yourself then, for I will drink Coffee.

THE FOURTH
DIALOGUE

BETWEEN

Lucinda and Antonia.

Lucinda. DOn't be so eager, let me empty my Mouth first.

Antonia. I said when you have done, Aunt.

Luc. Well, you know where I left off. That same Night Dorante came Home drunk; and being then always very abusive, he upbraided his Wife with her running away from a Father, killing a Mother, and ruining a Husband; railing at her as long as his Tongue could wag, till he dropp'd asleep. Next Morning as soon as he open'd his Eyes, looking on her with a Stern Countenance, he told her; Last Night, Aurelia, I suppose I rav'd, but now I'll be very serious: There is nothing in this World more scandalous than to be without Money; if I had had thought that I should have had none with you, I would never have Married you. This has been a great Disappointment to me, yet I have not valu'd it as long as I could procure a Plenty by my own Industry: It has cost me above Three Thousand Pound since I have had you; as you have had your Share in the Spending, what can be more reasonable, since the Getting any more my Way is impracticable, than that you should likewise endeavour to do something for your Living, when I shew you that the Method is as safe as it is easie? A Nobleman, from whom I expect every Thing, sighs for you, and adores you, a Husband desires you to be Yielding and Complaisant; yet you remain Obstinate and Ill-natur'd to hinder the Felicity of both. I have given you Hints enough, by which you might have understood my Pleasure: Would you have me to be more plain? Let him lye with you, and you'll oblige me: If not, I can keep you no longer; turn out with your Brats. The Pretences I hear, under which you cover your Ill-manners, are Vertue, and your Love to your Husband: Ought you not to Blush at such Frivolous Excuses? How often have I told you, that there is no Intrinseck Worth in any Thing but Money? This is the Standard, without which no Value can be set upon any Thing: It is in the World, what a Figure is in Arithmetick; the only Thing that standing by itself has any Signification; to which all the Vertues and Good Qualities are meer Cyphers, that are never to be used but to advance the Figure, always taking care to postpone 'em, if you would make him serviceable.

And

and therefore if you are possessed of any Virtue, that will get us Money, shew it; but as for bare Virtue, the very Moralists, that in extolling it, have wrong'd their Judgment to shew their Wit, must own, that it's worth nothing; for telling us that it is its own reward, is as much as if they would say be Virtuous as long as you live, and you'll get nothing but your labour for your pains. The next, that your Love to me should be the reason of your denial, is a Contradiction, for it is impossible that any one asked to do a kindness, should refuse it for the love of him that desires to have it done, and to whom it will prove beneficial: Your Youth, and want of Consideration, may mistake it for Love, Aurclia, but it is only your being besotted to a thing, you have been used too; as some Babes are fond of their own Bubby, tho' it be never so good for 'em to change their Milk: Have you never seen them, when they are put to a strange Breast, how they'll scratch and tear, cry their little Hearts out, and rather Starve, than draw it? This is your Case exactly, and there is as much Wit in the one as there is in the other. You are just like the Children, that can play a hundred pretty Tricks, if they please; when you are alone with them, they'll act them over and over again, till you are tired: but to oblige and divert your Friend, you shan't make 'em shew one, tho' you kiss'd their Breech; and instead of doing as you bid 'em, they'll run into a Corner to hide their Faces, and pray what is the reason? the same as yours, forsooth they are ashamed; prithee leave being so Childish, and consider you are a Woman, and have two Children of your own.

own. Whilst this damnable Doctrine was broaching, a Servant opened the Door, and told him my Lord was below. Dorante, bid her desire him to walk up, and shew him into the Dressing-Room, and when she was gone, squeezing his Wife by the Hand, he told her, you once said, I needed not doubt of being happy, if you could make me so, now is the time, shew it, adding these Words, while he slept on his Night-Gown; and if your Conscience be so foolishly Scrupulous, as to boggle at Sin, there is no occasion of committing any, unless you have a mind to it; for it being an Act of the Soul, it is in your power to prevent it, by having no Lustful Thoughts: Let him do what he pleases, and you think what you will: At the latter end of this Sentence, he jump'd out of Bed, and after he had let the Nobleman into the Chamber, pointing to his Wife, said, there lyes a Foolish Carrion, that has been crying this half Hour, and I can't tell ~~you~~ for what; She's very ticklish under the short Ribs, I wish your Lordship would try if you can't make her Laugh; then without staying for any Answer, went out the same Door the Nobleman was come in at, and immediately Lock'd it after him.

An. Execrable Villain! I dare not ask what befel Aurelia; for I can guess too well.

Luc. You may be mistaken; Aurelia, when her Husband began to talk to her first, hearkned to him very attentively, till becoming as he call'd it, more plain with her, she saw that there was no room left to doubt of his Damnable meaning; and then she was so over-deser...

overwhelm'd with Grief at the Thoughts of the unheard of Treachery, of the Man she Lov'd with such a violent Passion, she was not able to utter a word ; but the Tears, not dropping, but flowing from her Eyes in Streams, wept so bitterly, sobbing and wringing her Hands, with all the Signs of a profound and real Sorrow, that any Man but Dorante, would have had Compassion of her.
 When her Husband had Lock'd the Door, whilst the Gallant was eagerly coming to the Bed-side, protesting that he Loved her as he did his Soul, and designed her no more harm, than he did to himself, she had wrapt her self up in the Bed-cloaths, as well as the time would permit ; and as he took her in one Arm, and endeavour'd to get his other Hand between her self and the Sheet, she made a very Vigorous Defence : For tho' she could not hinder him from often Kissing, not only her Face, but several other parts of her Body, as by the Strugling they became to be bare,
 yet by her nimbleness in shifting her Posture, and employing his Hands so well with her own, they could never attain to the Liberty they chiefly strove for : She neither made great Noise, Bit or Scratch'd, but appear'd so resolute, and her Resistance was made with so much eagerness, and in such good earnest, that the Amorous Spark, seeing there was nothing to be done without breaking her Hands, and coming to downright Brutish Force, and being pretty well tired, let go his hold, and came to perswasions : Aurelia not slipping this opportunity, got with one Hand a Petticoat over her Head, whilst she snatch'd up her Gown with the other; and throwing it about her, flung her self with all the Strength she had, to the other side of the Bed, and from thence upon the Floor. His Lordship either not willing to come to a greater Extremity, or perhaps not finding himself in a Condition of going through the Fatigues of a Rape, offered no further Violence; but told her, he was sorry to see her in such a Fright; that she might assure her self, he had only been in Jest, and would never pretend to do any thing against her Will, with abundance more of such stuff, which she neither believed, nor replied to; and having had time enough to put on as much of her Cloaths, as was necessary to cover her, she got up and went to the Door; but finding it Lock'd, and hearing her Husband Singing in the other Room, she threw her self into the next Chair, fell again into such an Agony of Crying, and lamented her miserable forlorn Condition, with such Mournful and Heart-breaking Expressions, that the Nobleman began to be moved himself, and wiping off her Tears, did what he could to appease her, nor without Concern. Aurelia looking upon him, as he stood before her, and hoping she had found some signs of pity in his Face, Cast her self at his Feet, and imploring his Mercy with so much fervency, putting him in mind of his Birth, and conjuring him as he was a Generous Man, not to make use of an advantage gain'd by the Baseness of an unnatural Husband, that what she did, found so much Ingression, that he raised her from the Ground and and said, Pardon the Injuries. Madam I have done ye, and I'll offend no more : In the mean time he knocked with his Foot against the Door, which was almost as soon opened, then bidding her adieu, he Kiss'd her Cheek, and told her she deserved a better Fate; and going down Stairs, without so much as looking upon her Husband, went away. Dorante amazed at his Behaviour, and the Words he spoke, could not tell what Construction to put on their parting so good Friends: But his Wife falling down at his Feet, and in pitiful moan complaining of his Cruelty, in prostituting her Honour, which a Stranger had spared, he quickly understood, that his Plot had miscarried, and not being in a Humour of giving her an Answer, or hearing any more, as she was holding one of his Knees, he shook her off in Anger, and went out. After this, finding her altogether useless for his purpose, he seldom spoke to her, when he was Sober, but when he came home otherwise, she as seldom escaped being Beaten; he would have turn'd her out of Doors, but knowing his Character to be very Bad, and fearing to make it worse, he let her alone; contenting himself with selling every thing, she had, that was of Value. Whilst Dorante was leading this Life, his Mother, to whom he never had Writ since he left her, came to Town, on purpose to see him: She had been told some Years before, that her Son Lived very Great in England, and now hearing by chance, that he was in Dublin, she did not question, but that he did the same. The Son received her very Coldly, which the Old Woman perceiv-ing, wished she had saved her self a Journey. But as Dorante was then daily contriving, which way he should dispose of his Wife and Children, so after being informed, that his Mother could spare him no Money, which I think was the second Question he asked her, he thought fit to consult her about that Affair: When the Mother was acquainted with his Circumstances, and had heard, how he came by his Wife, that her Father was Alive yet, and so very Rich; she blamed her Son mightily, for treating her ill, which every Body in the House could not but see: Having considered every thing, her Advice was, if he could be contented to Live in the Country, that having sold his Household Goods, he should carry his Wife and Children to her House; and a Captain's Pay, with what she had, would maintain them all very plentifully. Dorante, who had a Mortal Aversion to a Country Life, being always used to Noise, and Great Company, thought it Death to be in a place, where there should be no Gaming, and could by no means resolve at first: But considering, how much he was in Debt, and that to Live much longer as he had done, was an utter impossibility; at last made a Virtue of Necessity. He was a Man of Dispatch, and quickly found a Chap-Man that took his Goods as they stood, which being Appraised, he turn'd all into ready Money; and he and his Mother, his Wife and Children, with a Servant or two, went all into the Country together,

As. Whilst

An. Whilst they are upon the Road, I must beg leave Aunt, to ask ye a Question or two.

Luc. Half a Dozen if you please.

An. I am much Charm'd with Aurelia's Fidelity to so undeserving a Wretch; but how she became to be Mistress of so much Goodness, my thinks is something Mysterious: She was very vainly brought up, her Father was an Ignorant Mechanick, Passionate Miser; her Mother a silly Imprudent Woman; and she wanted that Grave Council, and wholesome Advice, which, as you say, is much oftner, and more Effectually given, by an Understanding Sober Relation at Home, than by a Mistress at a Boarding School among Fidlers and Dancers. For how little Skill she had in Governing of her Self, and what Notions of the Duty, she owed her Parents, is very manifest from what she did. She falls in Love with a Man at first sight, which for ought she knew, might have been Dumb, answers his first Letter, and owns her Inclinations to him: Her Father raves at the discovery of her Passion, but notwithstanding the severity of his Anger, as soon as she is able, both against the Consent of an Obstinate Brutish Father, and without the Knowledge of a soft Indulgent Mother, runs away with him, leaves her Friends and Country, and follows his Fortunes wherever he pleases; without having the least Certainty of who, or what he was. This was the small Stock of Prudence with which she set out. After this, she is delivered Body and Soul, into the Hands of a Wheedling, Atheistical Husband, that with all the Cunning imaginable, does his utmost to infuse his Wicked Abominable Principles into her; and acting the Devils own Casuist, endeavours to reason her into Hell.

Luc. You are in a Passion Niece.

An. I beg your pardon for my heat, I can't think calmly on the Diabolical Doctrine of that Rascal, the Solicitor General of Satan: But I say Aunt, considering first the weakness and want of Discretion of the Woman, and afterwards the Tutor, she had, and the Love she bore him, is it not strange, that she should not only not swallow his Notions, but likewise so bravely withstand all the Temptations of a Nobleman's Courtship, approved of, and encouraged by her Husband? and in short, be so exemplary Virtuous, as rather to incur the utmost Displeasure of a Husband she Lov'd to Madness, be Poor, abused and stript, than by being Vicious to please him, and live high in the VWorld? Pray how came Aurelia to be such a Saint?

Luc. Is this all the Scruples you have?

An. No Aunt, there's another: I can't imagine, Considering, what plain Demonstrations Dorante gave all along of his Intentions, how she could be so Silly, as not to perceive, that he designed to make her a Prostitute to that Nobleman for Lucre, and seem so much a Stranger to his meaning, to the very Moment he explained it to her in that rough manner.

Luc. I shall solve both your Doubts at once, and am very glad that you have given me this this Opportunity of telling ye something, that may be Instructive to ye. All is not Gold that glitters; many things are done daily; for which People are extoll'd to the Skies, that at the same time, tho' the Actions are Good, would be blamed as highly; if the Principle from which they acted, and the Motive that first edg'd them on, were thoroughly known. When People are too Lazy, or fearful to undertake any thing, they are praised for being Contented; and the Effects of Avarice are often called Temperance and Sobriety. I know two Married People that seem to be very Loving, and never displeased with one another, and indeed they Live so well, that they are thought a very happy Couple: But you would hardly guess at the Reason of all this.

An. Without doubt they are both very Good Humour'd.

Lu. Just the Reverse, for their present Union is owing to no other Cause, than their being both Devils alike.

An. How can that be?

Luc. When they came first together, they Fell out, and Fought every Day like Dogs and Cats, and did one another abundance of Mischief. But as every one feels his own Hurt best, so both perceiving the ill Conveniences they got by every Quarrel, being equally Match'd, they became so terrible one to another, that at last they lived Peaceably, in Dread only of provoking one anothers Anger. This I told ye, because I suspected you would make the same mistake here, as you have done done in the Action of Aurelia; where you ascribe, that to her Virtue which proceeded from nothing, but her Superlative Love to Dorante: He was Quality, Riches, Honour, he was every thing to her; she doated upon him so excessively, that she thought there was no Bliss without him; and neither desired nor knew, any other Felicity, than what she enjoy'd in his Company: Do but mind, what the Consequence must be of such an extraordinary Passion, and you'll find, that she might have withstood much greater Temptations, than ever she lay under, without being a Saint, as you call her: If it had been a Principle of Vertue she acted by, she would have let him know, that she dislik'd the horrid Doctrine, which he Preach'd to her; but she never so much as shewed her self of another Opinion: All, what came from him, was diverting and pleasing to her, without ever Consulting the Morality, or Immorality of what he said or did, if he appeared but Gay and Good Humour'd. As to your other doubt, how she came not to find out his Design before he told it her so openly, the same excess of Love answers all; she knew, how little she could have parted with him to any other Woman, and measuring his Love by her own, how should she think that he intended to make a Whore of her? That he carried her into this Noblemans Company, often left 'em together, and ordered her to be Merry, and not disoblige him; by being Starch'd, was always contrived in Dorante's Favour: She call'd it the great Confidence her her Husband put in her, to trust her with a Man of ill Repute among Women: She suffered his Gallantry, because she thought her Husband had some end in it, which she never examined into; and really Dorante had such an Ascendant over her, he might have made her do any thing, and perhaps as Sinful as that; as long as it was not inconsistent with her Love: No Body commits a Sin for the sake of its being a Sin.

An. I thought, that when People were once Debauched in their Principles of Good and Evil, they would soon fall into all manner of Wickedness.

Luc. That's true, if it be a Wickedness that suits with her Inclinations, but not else: It won't make a Coward Kill a Man in a Duel, or one that is of a Jovial Temper, and has the World at Will, if he meets with a cross Accident, Hang himself; and yet they are both very great Sins. So that upon the whole, I see nothing, that can be called a Vertue; unless you think that a great one, That a Woman in the greatest Affliction that can be described, refuses a Man that comes to Ravish her, whilst her Husband is in the next Room.

An. No, I believe to Act that latter part, there was no great Occasion for Vertue, nor for Love neither.

Luc. Then Antonia, your Questions being answered, let me give ye a warning against so unaccountable Passion, from your own Observation: Take care, and never harbour it within your Breast; for how can any thing be

he trusted to, that makes People seem to be Virtuous, and yet commit those Faults and Extravagancies which Aurelia was guilty of, and your self has so concisely rehearsed.

An. I thank ye Aunt, and I'll take all the care I can, at least of not making my self Ridiculous: But if you please, I shall be glad now to hear, how Aurelia was treated at her Mother-in-Laws.

Luc. At their first coming down, they agreed tollerably well; Dorante by his Mothers Perswasions, shew'd her a better Countenance; but having none of his Diversions left him, but Racing and Hunting, he was always on Horse-back; and not being able to stay long near Home, where he had no Body to Converse with but the Family, he had not been there a Month, but he took a Man, and a couple of Horses, and went roving from one Town to another, without any Design. And whilst thus in quest of Good Company, he spent his Money about the Country, seldom neglecting to take any Pleasure he could meet with; his Wife having nothing, but what his Mother thought fit to give her, took all her Delight in her Children: She had a Boy, that could run alone, and a Girl, which is the Daughter, she has, and was then a Child in Arms. When Dorante was weary of Rambling up and down, he came Home again with the Purse much lighter than when he went: In his Travels he had met with an Ancient Gentleman, that was willing to Lend some Money upon Land Security; this run very much in his Head, he had nothing more of his his own that could be Mortgaged, but could not forbear thinking of his Mothers Jointure. Having framed a Formal Story, he accosts the Old Woman, told her how unpleasant it was to him to be Idle at home, and to think what his Children would come to, when he should Die; that he was but a Young Man indeed, and in the Flower of his Age; but that therefore it was a shame, that he should spend his Youth in doing of nothing, when at the same time, no Body knew, how to get Money better than himself; and suddenly throwing all the Fault upon his Marrying, he rail'd at his Wife. The Mother not knowing his Design, replied, that she truly thought it great pitty he ever left England, because she had heard he fared so well there; he told her, that if he was there yet, with only Five Hundred Pounds in his Pocket, he would not question but to make it Ten Thousand in two or three Years time. The Old Woman answering, that she wish'd, he had it with all her Heart, he said it was in her Power to help him to it, if she would but consent that he might take it upon the Estate where they Lived: If she pleased to do that, he would go only by himself, leave his Wife and Children with her, and order it so, that she should have his Pay sent her Quarterly; and if she took Pleasure in spending more Money, in a few Months he should be able to Furnish her with what she pleased: He was so great a Master in the Art of Wheedling, that at last he perswaded the Old Woman, and having her Consent, he took what

An. But you have told me nothing of what Aurelia did all that Five Years time: Did she never see Dorante since he went away with the Money he raised on his Mothers Jointure?

Luc. Yes several times ; for he never came to Ireland, but he spent a Fortnight or three Weeks at her House, diverting himself with Hunting in the Day time, and Drinking at Night. As for Aurelia, when her Husband was gone, his Mother led her a weary Life ; for seeing she understood all manner of Needle-Work very well, she plagued her about something or other every Day, and kept her so con-continually employed, that She had hardly time to do any thing for her Children, or her self. Dorante's Sister, who had been Married before ever he was of Age, had been a Widow above two Years, and left very Poor with one Child, that was about three Years Old when Aurelia came there; the Mother had been forced to take her and her Boy in again, or she must have starved. She was a great Slattern, and as Lazy as any Irish Woman whatever; the Mother allowed her more than her Daughter-in-Law; yet, tho' she had but one Child, and the other two, Aurelia's Children were always kept Cleaner, and look'd tighter than her one: The Old Woman would sometimes take notice of it to her own Daughter, who, besides that she always had been brought up in the Country, and Learn'd but little, had such an Antipathy against all manner of Work, that the very Name of it would throw her into a Sweat; She was so Malicious, and ill contrived a piece of Flesh, that when her Mother found fault with any thing about her self, or her Child, and bid her mind, how Aurelia did such a thing, she never fail'd of being Revenged upon her Sister, or her Children for it. The first commonly that she vented her Spleen against, was Aurelia's little Son, which was the Mothers Darling; she would either push him down, give him a private Pinch, or set her own Boy on to take away his Play-things, and if that would not make him Cry, as he was a very good Humour'd Child, spill half a Pot of Beer upon him, under pretence pretence of giving him to Drink; throw Water in his Face, cram some Nastiness, or Cheese in his Mouth, which he hated; and never leave Teazing the poor Boy, till she set him a roaring. If sometimes Aurelia spoke the least Word against either the Sister, or her Son, then presently the Mother was fetched, who should give her a hundred for it, call her Proud Minx, young Sawcy Slut, what had she to meddle with her Daughter, and with her Grand-Child? why did she not go to England, and fetch her great Portion with a Murrain to her? And the whole Family being all Irish, all Envied Aurelia for her Cleanliness, and always being Neater than they. If at any time she was Ironing or Starching any thing, her Back was not turn'd, but either the one should be Smutted, or the other be Tumbled, and turn'd to a Wisp, or trod under Foot. This was a Vexatious thing to a young Woman, that had been brought up as she was.

An. I dont know, what it was to her, but such things would have made me extream Angry.

Luc. This was nothing yet Antonia, and only in the beginning; this was no more than what every Woman in her Circumstances ought to have expected, from a Mother and Sister in Law in the same House: She had other Trials to exercise her Patience. When the News came that Aurelia's Father was Dead, and that by his Will the Daughter, nor her Children, were ever to be a Farthing the better for him; which Dorante brought in Luc.

brought the first time he came back, then the Old Woman was Raving Mad : She had always hoped, that early or late, some Good would come from the Old Gentleman, if 'or to the Daughter, at least to the Grand-Children. She had always hated Aurelia in her Heart, and that she desired at first, her Son to treat his Wife not so Inhumanly, and had yet been so little rude to her her self, was only in consideration of what she expected ; but when this fail'd, and she found her self baulk'd beyond redress, she was a continual Plague to her, and made it her business to study, which way to torment her. Aurelia's Daughter, who was now above a Year Old, had been ill for a great while ; they had continued to let her Suck, because they were afraid, that taking the Breast from her, would have killed her ; she was the very Picture of her Father, and the Grand Mother loved her very well for his sake ; yet tho' the Child was so weak still, that it could not walk a Step, upon these Tidings, the Nurse was sent away the next Day, and the Mother forced to Wean it, and tend it her self : No Servant in the House was allowed to do any thing for Aurelia ; what she would have done, she was obliged to do her self ; which often she would have been glad of, if they would but have let her alone : But she was thwarted and crossed in every thing she took in hand : If ever she had occasion to use a Bowl, a Skiller, or any thing else, her Sister was sure to want it at the same time ; and if she pretended to Contend about the matter, the Mother was called, and she would soon decide, who should have it.

An. A very Miserable Life indeed ! But I would beg of you to acquaint me with Aurelia's Sentiments concerning Dorante ; did her Love still continue after that Undeniable, as well as Villanous proof he had given her of his Contempt, a little before they parted from Dublin ?

Luc. This Antonia, is one of the most remarkable Parts of her History, and therefore I would have kept it for the last, but since ye ask me for it, I will satisfy ye. The deep Sorrow in which we left her, when her Husband shook her off, lasted no longer than that Day ; for the succeeding Night opened her Eyes, and she was roused from her Lethargy of Love. Dorante was vex'd at his being disappointed, and flying to the usual remedy of Drowning his Cares in Claret, he came Home in such a Terrible Humour, that having Knock'd down the Servant that opened him the Door, he went up to his Wife, and the first thing he did, was taking the Candle, and holding it very near her, under pretence of looking, whether she was still a Crying, he set good part of her Hair, and all her Head-Cloaths on Fire ; whilst she was busie in quenching the Flame, he asked her touching the Nobleman's Tossing her in the Morning, some very unpleasant Questions, after a Brutish manner, and in as Nasty Language as he could invent :
But

But Aurelia not answering soon enough to please him, he wrapt out a great Oath, and said, he believed, she was resolv'd to keep her Tongue as close as her Tail; but if she did, he could open her Mouth, and at the same time, doubling his Fist, he gave her such an unmerciful Blow in the Face, as knock'd her down backward, and made her Bloody all over; then dragging her out of the Room by one of her Arms, all the way Swearing, she should not Lie there, he kick'd her down Stairs, shut his Chamber Door, and went to Sleep. Aurelia being come to the bottom, was very much Bruis'd, but had the good Fortune not to break any Limb; and having light a Candle, went to Bed in another Chamber; where considering, what was past, very Seriously, the first thing that awak'd her from her Grief, was her Fear, she dreaded to see Dorante again, and thought her self in Danger of her Life: What could be expected from a Husband, that having told her how weary he was of her, did his utmost to have her Ravish'd in the Morning; and that not succeeding, endeavour'd at Night, first to Burn her up Alive, and then to break her Neck? She could hardly promise her self any better, but that the last means of getting rid of her, being likewise fail'd, he would Cut her Throat the next: But several things of different Natures, presenting themselves to her Mind, Fear was not the only Passion that disturb'd her, being very Sore every where, and full of Pain, when she thought of the Hurt she had received, she forgot her Fear and grew Angry : But if she reflected on what it was for, and by whom she was so ill treated, then she was so amazed, that she could never remember what she thought : When the dismal Prospect of her present Circumstances came to her Fancy, her Sorrows return'd, and she was seized with a deep Melancholy ; which would last, till looking back on her own Conduct, which had been the occasion of all, she started from it, and fell into despair. She would be revenged of her self, and thought on Death in several Shapes ; but all appearing equally Frightful to her, she ran Distracted to see that she was forced to Live. She Complained, she Cursed, she Cried, she Raved ; and in this Confusion of so many Passions, shaking her at once, she continued till late in the Morning. Dorante was Dress'd and gone Abroad, before the Maid that waited on his Wife, knew that her Mistress had not layn in her own Bed that Night ; but seeing, she was not there, she went to look for her in the other Room, where she found her sitting upright in the Bed, employed as I told ye.

The Presence of the Maid wrought a very good Effect upon the Mistress ; for Aurelia being displeased at being Surprised in that Posture by a Servant, rally'd all the Reason she had, to compose her Senses : She lay down and told the Maid, that she had been troubled with a Violent Pain in her Head all Night long ; whether the Servant believed what her Mistress

Mistress

The next morning
told her the same story

Mistress said, or thought something else to be the Cause of her Disorder, Aurelia could not tell; if she had heard her Masters Quarrelling the Night before, she was Discreet enough, not to say any thing of it; but advising her Mistress to Rest, never left her till she was fast a Sleep; being very much Tired, she did not open her Eyes again before Night; when her Maid, having provided something for her, against she should Wake, perswaded her to take some Food; having eat a little, she found her self much Refresh'd, and almost Calm within; her Face was Swell'd, and her Bruises pained her sadly; but as the Soreness of her Body increased, so her Mind grew more Sedate: And having quite recovered the use of her Reason by the next Day, she was very glad to see her Self Safe; for calling to Mind the horrid Thoughts, that had run through her Brain, she found that her Life was only owing to her Natural Fearfulness, and the Maids coming into the Room as she did; since it could be nothing but Irresolution, and want of Courage, that had hindred her from laying Violent Hands upon her self.

An. But I believe Aunt, you never intend to tell me, whether she still Loved him, or not?

Luc. Have Patience a little Antonia, I'm a going. Aurelia had so many different Agitations in her Soul that Night her Husband beat her for the first time; that being all equally Mutinous, none could be predominant enough to make a great impression upon her ; and this I take to be the reason, that she was so easily restored to her Senses : As for her Love, she felt no more of it within two Days after, as if she had never seen him before.

An. Then was it not succeeded by a great Hatred against him ?

Luc. Not at first of all, as she told me ; she remained the same, only that Folly was skinn'd off ; which made me think, that in the great Fermentation of her Passions, as Love had stirr'd them up, so working through them, it made all the Froth ; and Swimming a great while above the rest, was quite lost when they had done Boiling over. Aurelia not being of a great Spirit, behaved her self to her Husband, as an Humble Slave to a Cruel Master : When he had struck her the second time, she began to stand in great Awe of him ; her Fear made her Obsequious, and she studied not so much, how to please him, as to avoid every thing that might offend him. She was not ignorant of the Miserable Condition she was in, would have willingly parted, and gone away from Dorante with all her Heart ; but what could she do with her Children, whom she Doated on ? the Thoughts of her Circumstances would often make her Weep, but she resolved to bear with any thing, rather than leave her Dear Babes. Being a tender small Boned Creature, of all her Sufferings, nothing was more irksome to her than Dorante's Blows ; and tho' she was far from from Striking again, the Smart of 'em would make her Angry, and with him ill; but when being so Cautious, as I told you, and doing not the least thing, that might be taken amiss, she saw that he was still the same; and he fell upon her the third time without any Provocation at all; then the sight of him began to be very Odious to her, which by the little regard, Dorante shew'd for her, and the continuance of his Abusing her without a Cause, was in a short time so much improv'd, that, when they went into the Country, she Hated him almost as much as ever she had Loved him.

An. I should have thought, that he had given her a more Substantial Reason, to deserve her Hatred the Morning before he Beat her, than he did ever after.

Luc. Had I been telling you a Romance, I would have made use of Art; I know as well as you, Niece, what should have been done according to their Rules. As soon as Dorante had told her his meaning, and declared himself with that Impudence, I should immediately have turn'd her Love into Hatred: But in a true Story, we must relate things as they happen. Aurelia was not a Bold Blustering Woman; she was of a meek and quiet Temper; and, for this Reason, the first Passion it rais'd in her, was her Sorrow, which shew'd that her Love yet remain'd; or else it would not have been such an Affliction to her: It was not his Beating her afterwards, for which she Hated him so much; but it was the Beating that Roused her Thoughts, and made her look back: The Reason why at first it produced such irregular Motions in her Brain, as to make her Mad, was, that then her Love was still mixed with the other Passions; but when that was thrown off, you see, the second Beating only made her Careful, how to prevent it for the future: She was not at leisure yet, to make Serious Reflections on things past; the Wretchedness of her present State took up all her Thoughts; She could not keep her Eye from what was immediately before her; Dorante's Cruelty, and his Poverty were equally Frightful to her; for as the one Scared her with Death, so the other Threatned her with Want. These Dismal Prospects employed her wholly; she could not give her self leave to examine, whether she Hated him or not: But when Time had taken off great part of her Concern, and she was Struck again the third time, which she had dreaded before; then the Pain made her Angry, and think on the Cause, which brought in all the rest; for being now grown acquainted with her Misery, it was not so pressing, as to take up every Moment of her Time; She had more Leisure to call to Mind, and Sedately Review, what was past: She now made use of her Reason, Examined the vast extent of her former Love; and, Measuring by that, the prodigious height of his Ingratitude, Built her Hatred on a Solid Foundation.

An. I Confess Aunt, what Aurelia did, seems now to me more Natural, than what I thought at first, she should have done.

Luc. I am weary of Talking, Antonia, and must leave the remainder till another time.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN LUCINDA
ANTONIA.

Antonia. YOU have informed me before, how Dorante's Mother and Sister stood affected to Aurelia, after they knew the Old Gentleman's Will : But pray what Face did he put upon the matter, I mean the Husband, himself, that loved nothing, but Money, and treated her so Barbarously, before all his Hopes were quite extinct ? How did he behave himself towards her, when he was assured, that she never would be worth any thing to him.

Lucinda.

Lucinda. Much as he used to do; but if there was any alteration, rather better, than worse, when he was not in Drink.

Ant. What could make his Humour change for the better?

Luc. Tho' Dorante's Mother had always entertained some Hopes, that Aurelia's Father would one Day or other relent, or at least not wholly forget his Grand-Children, as well as his Daughter, when he should Dye; yet he himself was Wiser; when once two Years were past, and Aurelia's Father had taken no more Notice of her, than if she had been a Dog, and had so often refused to hear them, that would speak in her behalf, considering his Stubborn Temper, he thought no more of him. So Dorante was not disappointed as to that; and his Wife, who was not Twenty yet, when her Father Died, being a pretty Woman, whom he had not seen in 9 or 10 Months, was a Novelty to him: He was so Debauched, that he could never be without Women, wherever he stay'd; and as I told ye, how he divided his Years, whenever he was in the Country at his Mothers, where he could get no Body else, he was glad to have her; not that he ever treated her with the Tendernefs, and Affection, he Counterfeited at first; but only made use of her to serve his Incontinence; giving her sometimes a piece of Money, as being Lavish, he did on the same Account to any Strumpet when he thought her Poor.

Ant. But

Ant. But such Usage would have been more dreadful to me, than all his Anger, when once I hated him.

Luc. It was the same to Aurelia: for as her Hatred to her Husband, which, when she came to Live with her Mother, was not yet of long standing, in time grew more inveterate; so you may well imagine, that his Brutish Kindness at last was very Loathsome to her: Whilst he was gone, every harsh Word, and every disobliging Action, of either his Mother, or his Sister, were all placed on his Account; and having so many Months to reflect on all the Passages between them, her Aversion to him increased daily; and was, before he came back, fully as excessive, as her former Love. She knew her Mother-in-Law had parted with all; that Dorante's Pay was the only Dependence of the whole Family; and that without, she was to seek Bread for her Self, and Children; yet such was her Hate, she could not forbear every time she saw him, to wish it might be the Last: She could have been contented to hear that he had been Stabb'd, Hang'd, or Drowned, or that some unruly Horse had broke his Neck, so she had been troubled no more with his Company: She trembled whenever he came near her; his Breath was so Nauseous to her, that she thought his Kisses Baneful; and the Touch of Toads and Adders could be no more unwelcome, than his Embraces. Then Judge Antonia, what a Horror his Presence was to her; since the mildest part of his Behaviour was was no less Displeasing to her, than the roughest Usage. Yet her Fear forced her to submit to all; for if ever she seemed Tardy in complying with any thing he asked of her, she was sure, that the first time he should be in his Cups, he would most Inhumanly resent it. When Aurelia, of whom I have all what happened to her in Ireland, had thus far related, what had befallen her, I thought that her Hatred and Indignation to Dorante, were arrived to the highest Pitch, and nothing could make 'em greater; but was amazed, when, after having paused a while, I heard her say, had this been all Lucinda, Dorante's Injurys might have been Buried in Oblivion; the Tears I then so often shed, in time would have wash'd away my Sorrows; and laying the Fault of all the Indignities I bore, upon the Youthful Folly of my own Love, I could now think on Dorante without disturbance in my Soul; but after this, he was the Savage occasion of a Tragical Accident, which I cannot forget the longest Day I Live, and must Lament for ever. When she said this, I saw her wipe her Eyes, and after that she told me the Sad, and Mournful Story in these very Words. Dorante, said she, was come Home to his Mothers for the fourth time, since he had first left us, when my Son was about five Years Old; he was a very Sensible Child, not indeed so Pert, and Witty, as some are; neither was he so Bold, as I have seen a great many; but then he was likewise less Wild than Boys commonly are, and and so seldom committed any Rudeness, that I never knew a Child of a Milder and Sweeter Temper : But what was most admirable in him, was his great Solidity, beyond his Age. I confess, that I Doated on the Child, and as Dorante's Mother 'Loved my Daughter, because she was like her Son, so my little Boy fared the worse, because he resembled me. He was such Charming Company to me, and would shew so much Sorrow in his Countenance, when he saw any of the Family do something to make me uneasie : Oh ! when I think on his engaging Promises, what he would do for me, when he should be a Man, and how often he wish'd to be one for my Sake ! Oh the Remembrance ! Lucinda, no Consolations of any Orator, could ever be more obligingly Floquent, than were the Dumb Signs of his Pity and Grief, when he saw his Mother abused : I know 'tis wrong, to make a Distinction in our Inclinations between Children ; Parents should distribute their Love with a Just, and equal hand among them ; but here I could not help it ; my Daughter through Illness was very Froward, and afterwards the Grand-Mother giving her more Liberty, than I would have allowed her, grew a Ramping Girl ; and having gain'd her by little Gifts, which, as I was kept, I was not able to bestow ; the Old Woman took great Delight to see, that she could draw her from me ; and besides, that the Girl would but seldom stay with me in the Day-time, they would always tease me, in telling me I did not Love her !

Heaven

Heaven knows it was false ; but how could I shew so much Love to her, who not Contented to be, where she could get nothing, was always with my Mother-in-Law ; as I could to my dear Sober Boy, that despising their Bribes of Tarts, and Sweet-Meats, with which they Coaxed his Sister from me, would hardly ever leave me. Oh ! He was a dear Lover of his Mother ! On me he fix'd his Eye, and wore no other Looks, than such, as he derived from mine : I never Wept, but that he Cried, and if at any time I seemed to have forgot my Grief, and Smiled upon him, Oh ! how Gloriously Serene would his Innocent Angels Face appear ! in saying this, she would have withstood her Tears ; but, when I saw several drop from her unwilling Eyes, I would have interrupted her ; but, that seeing, what I was about, she hindred me by telling me : I know Lucinda, these things are tiresome to you ; for tho' you're Older than I, you never knew, what it was to be a Mother. But pardon my Fondness, and I'll transgress no more ; and then she continued thus : Both my Children Lay with me a Nights ; but when Dorante came, I was forced to contrive a little Bed for one of 'em, upon some Chairs ; the Girl would not Lie by her self ; but my Poor Contented Boy, was willing to comply with any thing. Dorante had been with us 16 or 18 Days, and was to go for Dublin the next Morning ; when, having Caroused all Day, he came home late at Night in an ugly Humour ; coming into the Room, and, finding me me gone to Bed, he sets himself down in a Chair, having Scolded at me a little while, for not Sitting up for him; as he was undressing himself, he calls me to him; I dared not Disobey, and would have slipt on my Gown, but he bid me come as I was; and standing in my Shift before him, he asked something of me, which was so Lascivious, and, as I thought at that time, so disagreeable, that, tho' I strove to hide it, I could not forbear discovering the Reluctancy of my Mind; this was a heinous Crime to Dorante; who, having upbraided me with several Instances of greater Wantonness; which, perhaps I might have been guilty off in the height of my former inconsiderate Passion, at last Spurn'd me from him: I went to Bed again, and he continued Railing, and Grumbling, as upon such Occasions he was used to do; he told me, that, tho' I loved a thing never so well, I would rather deny it to my self, to vex him, than take the Pleasure of it, if I thought it would oblige him. He said many other things; and among the rest, as he was going away the next day, he had a good Mind to make me remember him till he came again. In every thing he said or did, he shew'd himself Angry, and Displeased; and, as he was coming to Bed, in turning up the Cloaths, not being used to stand much upon Compliments with me, he flung every Rag from me, and left me quite Naked. My dear Boy, who was Awake, but had not spoke a Word yet, seeing this, after having heard what his Father said, made no doubt, but he was going to execute execute his Threatnings ; and making all the haste to him, before he could get into Bed, took hold of his Leg, with abundance of Tears, entreating him not to hurt his Mother. Dorante, who had already one Foot upon the Bed, looking back upon the begging Posture of the Child, and disliking, he should shew so much Concern for me, Maliciously resolved to Frighten him throughly ; then Staring upon him with a Stern Look, what ! Sirrah, said he, would ye help your Mother against me ? Come, I'll make away with your Mother ; and immediately getting from the Boy, he ran to his Sword, and Drawing it, he came to me seemingly in a great Fury : I observ'd the Humour Dorante did it in ; and apprehending no Danger at this time, I lay still, and said nothing to him : And the same Moment, as he was turning from me, I suppose, to see how the Boy would take it, I heard Dorante say, what ails the Boy ? The Rascal is making Mouths ; and at the end of these Words, he stept into Bed, and lay down. Not understanding what Dorante meant, nor hearing the Boy say any thing to him, I look'd up, and saw my Child in Fits : I did what I could to recover him, but one was no sooner off, but he fell into another : The next Day Dorante went his Journey, without taking any Notice, either of me, or the Child. About the same time that he was taken with his first Fit, they left him the Night following ; but then he fell into so Violent a Fever as carried him off the Seventh Day after. Here Aurelia left off, and took her leave.

Ant. These I confess are extraordinary Afflictions! But in the relation of this last Accident, I wonder, she should shew so much Concern; whilst she dwell'd on the Childs Praise only, and none at all, when she came to that Part, of which she ought to have been most Sensible.

Luc. I don't think that strange at all; it differs much, who the Person is, that tells the Story: She was the Mother, and knowing all what had past, as soon as she began it, nay, before she came to it, the Thoughts of that great Loss forced the Tears from her: The Rehearsal, and Description of his Endearing Temper and Actions, was only Indulging her Grief; for it did nothing to the Story.

Ant. Yet it has given me a greater Sense of her Loss, and the Sorrow it must have caused her.

Luc. I knew that, and therefore I assumed Aurelia's Person, and spoke her own Words.

Ant. But what I would ask, is, why she should discover so little Tenderness, when she spoke of his falling in Fits, the Fever that succeeded them, and his Death, where I would have most expected it?

Luc. For the same Reason; when she was telling me the first Part, the latter was in her Mind; till she thought, I was weary of hearing so much of it.

Ant. At which, I believe, she was Nettled a little; for her telling ye, you knew not what it was to be a Mother, looks, as if it was by way of Reflection, because she found you was going to interrupt her.

Luc. It

Luc. It was so ; then Arming her Self with Resolution, she related the rest ; and coming to the most Dismal Part, mentioned not one Circumstance, but ran over it as fast as she could ; and for fear of shewing any more Weakness, left me presently.

Ant. My thinks I long to see her relieved ; how long was she plagued with Dorante's Mother, and all that Irish Generation.

Luc. From the Childs Death, the Old Woman took another Opportunity of Tormenting the Mother : She told Aurelia, that her Son being Dead, whom only she had minded, she thought her very Superfluous in the Family ; that she was resolved to keep her no longer Idle ; and if she would have Bread there, she should do something to Earn it : Then dismissing one of the Two Maids they kept, the Daughter-in-Law was ordered to do her Work ; and after this, she not only did the Maids Business, but was in every respect dealt with as a Servant ; set aside that they gave her no Wages.

Ant. But which way had she Cloaths then ?

Luc. She had none, but what the Mother, or Sister-in-Law Left off ; and if she disliked this way of Living, she might mend her self as soon as she could.

Ant. And so I would have done, if I had been in her place : One that was brought up a Gentlewoman, and understood her Needle so well, might have made shift with one Child.

Luc. She would have gone several times, and had Words about it long before her Son Died : Nay, the Old Woman was willing to be rid of Aurelia and the Boy, but she would never part with the Girl; and Aurelia, who really Loved her Children, could never resolve to leave one, more than the other. There was a Gentlewoman that Lived about 3 Miles off, near where sometimes, they went to hear Mass; with whom Aurelia had been Acquainted ever since she had been four or five Months in the Country: She would have often Furnished her with Necessaries, to carry her and her Children to Dublin.

Ant. But I heard ye speak of Mass, was Aurelia brought up a Papist?

Luc. No, her Father was a Presbyterian; but she was so little Grounded in her Religion, that it was not difficult for Dorante to pervert her.

Ant. But why Dorante? what was it to him what Religion she was of? for I am sure he had none.

Luc. He was the same, as all Roman Catholics are; for whether they be Vertuous or never so Debauched, they will all in general take abundance of Pains, and rather spend their Money than fail, to bring People of other Perswasions over to their Church.

Ant. That's very unaccountable; but yet, as they believe, that their Religion is the best, it is a great Sign of their Charity to others.

Luc. What their real Principle is that makes them do it, I don't pretend to determine, but nothing can be said of it with greater Truth, than what you did at first, by calling it unaccountable. So Aurelia could not expect to be released, nor ever

ever was, during Dorante's Life ; but that lasted not long, she only saw him once, whilst she remain'd in the Office we left her ; and when he came, was heartily glad of her Station ; because keeping her self as Dirty and Sluttish, as it was possible, to scape his Conversing with her, it proved a Fence against his Brutality, as well as his Kindness, which were equally dreadful to her. He had not been gone four Months, but Aurelia was revived with the Joyful Tidings of his Death. A Gentleman, of whom he had won some Money, hearing which way he lost it, call'd him to an Account ; demanding either his Money back, or Satisfaction in the Field : Dorante having had always Courage enough to maintain what he did, chose the latter ; and the Event of the Battle, deciding the Justice of the Cause, was Kill'd upon the Spot. This was Terrible News to Dorante's Mother and Sister, who, having nothing to depend upon, were forced severally to shift for themselves. The first Pleasure Aurelia had, since she came in the Country, was to see the Consternation, and Streights, her Mortal Enemies were in ; and in few Days, She and her Daughter, by the Assistance of the Gentlewoman I spoke of, were carried to Dublin. Aurelia intended to see several Ladys, that had desired her Acquaintance at her first coming into Ireland ; not questioning, but they would put her in some way or other to Live ; and in this she was not mistaken ; for the second she went to, was so touch'd with Compassion, at the relation of her Sufferings, that she had not the power to let her go ; and Entertaining her and her Daughter at her own House, was resolv'd to try, what could be done for her : This Charitable Gentlewoman, went among all her Relations, and all her Acquaintance, to serve Aurelia ; and had already made a handsome beginning : When coming to an Eminent Merchants Lady, as she was telling her Errand, and the Misfortunes of the Person, in whose behalf she spoke, the Gentlewoman of the House, took Notice of Dorante's Name ; and having asked it twice over, said, if she was not mistaken, she heard her Husband enquire after such a Captain's Lady ; then left the Room, and immediately came back with her Husband. The Merchant holding a Letter in his Hand, asked the Gentlewoman, if she could inform him of the Widow of one Captain Dorante, who had been Kill'd in England some Months ago. The Gentlewoman Surprized to hear him ask after Aurelia with so much earnestness, and considering, whether it would not be a Dis-service to her, was at a stand ; which the Merchant perceiving, he Smiled upon her, and told her, it was for no harm to her Friend : If she knew such a one, he was ordered by his Correspondent, to assist her in every thing, she might want ; and to desire her to go for England, where she should be very well received. Then he was going to shew her the Letter ; but the other, Overjoy'd at the Discovery, ran Home immediately, and fetch'd Aurelia. The Merchant having found by her answering to several Questions, that she was the Person he wanted,

Aurelia: gentlewoman: beautiful

wanted, proffered her his House, and what Money she might have occasion for. I suppose, I need not tell ye, that this was acceptable to Aurelia: The only thing, that troubled her was, that not knowing the Person, that Writ the Letter, she could no ways imagine, who it should be, that sent for her to England: But as every one, that considered her Circumstances, perswaded her to go, and she her self felt little Reluctancy in leaving a Country, where she had suffered so much, besides the Inclination, she had for her own, took hold of the first Opportunity of Shipping, and came for England.

Ant. Then she did not accept, of what her kind Friend had Gather'd for her.

Luc. She refused it at first; for being furnished by the Merchant with more Money, than her present Occasions required, she thought it a Crime, not to decline the acceptance of it; but the Good Nature'd Gentlewoman, pressing it hard upon her, and using many Arguments, of her not knowing, what Home to go to, who it was that Writ for her, and what might yet happen, she took it very Gratefully, upon Condition, that when she should come to England, if she found, that she stood not in need of it, in pursuance of the End it was given for, she should Dispose of it, to others, that did. Aurelia having had a bad Passage, stay'd a Day at Chester, to rest her self, and took Coach the next: When they came near London, she began to think, what she should do first; she wondred a Man, whom she had never known should not only fend for her to England; but likewise give such large Orders to let her have, what Money she asked for. She knew of no Relations, she had in the City, and it being late already, was in great Doubt; whether she should Lye at the Inn, that Night, or go to the Gentleman, to whom she had the Letter, which the Merchant had given her at Dublin. Whilst these things ran in her Head, the Coach Drove into the Inn: Aurelia was hardly got out, and come into the Light, but a Handsome Young Gentleman, of Eight and Twenty, or Thirty Years of Age, made up to her, and without asking any Questions, Saluting her, and calling her by her Name, bid her welcom to England. Aurelia was Amazed, and Blushing, beg'd his Pardon for not knowing him; the Gentleman replied Smilingly, that he hoped shortly, to have the Honour of being better acquainted with her: And having taken care of a Trunk, she had, Handed her and her Daughter into a Gentlemans Coach, that waited for him in the Yard, then got in himself, and bid the Fellow drive Home.

Ant. And so I suppose she got a Second Husband. He found very little Opposition my thinks, and certainly no Body ever wanted less Courtship than Aurelia.

Lu. I thought you would Censure her, but I think you are in the Wrong, I can't see what she has committed, that you can find so much fault with.

An. I

An. I don't blame her for committing any thing, but for omitting, what she ought to have done, when she had told him, that he was a Stranger to her ; and he seeing her in that incertitude, instead of telling her, who he was, made her that familiar Complement, by which he shew'd himself Cock-sure of her ; she ought to have broke off all Conversation with him ; but not suffer'd her self without speaking a word, like a Natural, to be led into a Coach, not knowing whose it was, or whither it was to go.

Lu. I'm afraid you don't consider her Circumstances, as you should do ; since she had taken Money from an unknown Friend, and was come to London at his Request, she might well have Patience, till she was Housed somewhere, to be better informed : She had no reason to doubt, but that this was either the Man himself, or some body, that belong'd to him, by whose Order she had been so well taken Care of ; she was come, where she had a promise, she should be well received, and hitherto found nothing to the contrary ; as she was in a Labyrinth, I think, the best way to have this Matter clear'd up to her, was silently to accept of every thing, that was Civil. She had been Married once for Love, and fared by it, as you know : If it was a Match a going forward, I don't know, what Reason she had to Complain, or take Notice of it, before she had any further Proposals made her.

An. But still she ought to have said something.

Lu. If

Lu. If you had a mind to comply with him, pray what would you have said, that would have been to the purpose?

An. But I did not take it for granted, that she would comply.

Lu. For a Widow with a Child, and nothing else, it would have been Foolish to refuse an offer, before it was made to her, especially, where every thing look'd with so fair an Aspect; but whilst Aurelia was thus taking, I think, the wisest Course, if she said little, she thought the more. She was of your Opinion, and conceived, she ought to say something; but not being able to Hammer out an Answer, she liked, and having besides so many things to reflect on, the Gentleman, the Coach, which was in all probability his own, his Care, and his Assurance; She was so confounded, that she could say nothing almost, that was worth any thing: It was so Dark, or at least she was so little acquainted with the City, that she could not tell what Streets they drove through; but at last a great pair of Gates being open'd, they were set down at the Door, of what seem'd a large Merchants House: The same Gentleman Squired her in, and immediately she was welcom'd by an Elderly Gentleman, who, with Tears in his Eyes, calling her likewise by her Name, Embraced her, with all the Tenderness of a Father. Aurelia, who knew the old Gentleman no more than the young One, seeing every thing look handsome, and well, began to think, she was Enchanted. But as there was no Body there, that had a mind to conceal himself, she presently understood, the the Eldest was the Master of the House, and a Relation of her's by the Mothers side, whom she had never seen, because there had always been a great Enmity, between her Father, and him: Then he told her all, what I related before had happen'd, at her Fathers, and proved to be the same Kinsman, that had taken in her Mother, after she was turn'd out of Doors. The Coach, that brought her from the Inn, was his own; and the Gentleman, that had waited on her, his intimate friend, an Irish Merchant, whom he desired to write to Dublin about her, as soon as he had heard that Dorante was Kill'd. She heard likewise, that he had always shewn a very great Affection for her Mother, when she was a Maid; as the only Relation, he had then alive, that knowing her Fathers Humour, he always had dissuaded her, from that Match; but that having disoblged him by Marrying, was the reason: There had not been any Correspondence between 'em, till after her falling out with her Husband, he took her in out of pity: He told her, that he had been glad to hear, that Dorante, and she lived so well, as he was informed, they did the first Year, after they went away. That after she was gone to live in the Country, he had been sorry, that he could hear no more Tidings of her; that whenever he heard Dorante was come to England, he had always sent People to him, to enquire after her VVelfare. This old Gentleman was a rich Batchelor, past threescore; he had been a Trader, but had left off all manner of Business for some Years; he was a Facetious, Generous Man, kept a very good good House, of which he proffer'd the Government to Aurelia, if she design'd to live Single; otherwise he had a Portion for her, if she would follow his Advice in the matter. But Aurelia's Teeth were too much set on edge, to Bite again in that sour Apple; she told him, that since he gave her the Choice, with his leave, she design'd to keep as she was; that she had been very inconsiderate in loving a Man, without examining into his Fortune; but that if her Father had been less Cruel, in forcing her to take a Man she hated, she would never have come to that Extremity, as she had done.

An. And do you believe that?

Lu. You know, VWomen will always have something to say for themselves; however, she was VVise enough not to Marry again.

An. Then I lost a VWedding by the Bargain; I was in great hopes of the Gentleman, that received her at the Inn.

Lu. He was a Married Man, and had two or three Children.

An. By the manner you spoke in, any Body would have believed, there would have been a Match.

Lu. I confess, what I said was a little suspicious; but I did it to see, how soon you would swallow the Hook, if it was covered with that Bait.

An. Then I suppose, what Aurelia has got, came from this Kinsman.

Lu. Yes; she lived with him five or six Years, and was treated, as if she had been his Daughter, or

or rather his Sister. She did what she pleased, Invited whom she would, and kept the best of Company ; when he Died, which was about fifteen Years ago, he left her besides the two Houses, she has now, and what belong'd to them, above twenty thousand Pound.

An. There is Variety enough in her Life, to make a Novel of.

Lu. Now, Antonia, let us come to the point; do you think, that what she enjoys in her Daughter, can make amends for what she has suffer'd ?

An. No indeed, I have done with her ; and my Eyes begin to draw Straws.

Lu. Nay; 'tis high time ; it wants but a few Minutes of Eleven : Good Night Niece.

An. Aunt your Servant, I wish ye a good Repose.

LUCINDA
ANTONIA.

Lucinda. HERE Niece, here I have got a Present for ye.

An. A Lap-Dog ! I never saw a finer large Eye in my Life : Oh, sweet Creature ! there's delicate Ears.

Lu. 'Tis a right Bolognese ; you must bestow a Silver Collar upon it.

An. No, that will hurt it ; I'll make it a pretty one of Ribbons : What, is it a Bitch ? Pray what's the Name of it ?

Lu. I can't tell, it shall be what you please.

An. Then I'll call it Die ; Die, Die, Diana, Die.
I'm

Next day

I'm glad it is a Bitch, Aunt ; I'll borrow Sir James's Dog ; that's just such another ; then we shall have charming Puppies. What d'ye Laugh at Aunt ?

Lu. You give your Bitch a very Chaste Name ; and, the next thing, you think off, is Generation.

An. That's nothing in our Town, as long as she is Old enough ; our Neighbour, what d'ye call him, the Anabaptist, Married his Daughter the same Day she was Christen'd.

Lu. Fie, Antonia, what a comparison you make ; besides, let Peoples Opinions be never so erroneous, as long as it is a Religion, it never ought to be the Subject of our Mirth. But what makes you so Wanton this Morning ?

An. I think, I am far from it ; these two or three Mornings, I have had abundance of Water upon my Stomach ; methinks I am very Maukish.

Lu. You will drink that Chocolate with Ambergriese and Venellies ; I told ye, it was not good for ye ; it makes your Blood too rich, and you take no Exercise. I saw how ye hugg'd Camilla just now, as if you would have Kiss'd her through.

An. You make me Blush, Aunt ; is there any harm in Kissing her ?

Lu. It was not design'd for your Sister, and look'd to me, as if you had been venting some other Thoughts ; had you been Kissing all Mankind in her, you could have expressed no more eagerness. But have ye thought of some body else, for your Pattern, instead of Aurelia ? Remember member that it must be a Woman of my Age, that is Married still, or at least was, so the greatest part of her Life-time, since she was twenty Years Old. As for Aurelia, if she had been the happiest Woman in the World, it was not fair to Chuse her; She was Married but seven Years, has been Single above twenty since, and is hardly fourty four yet.

An. But then Aunt, on the other side, I hope you don't suppose, I must have Aurelia's Indiscretion; if she had but enquir'd into Dorante's Character, it seems, he was known enough about Town, she could not have been imposed upon; and I am too little acquainted with People of your Age, and perhaps of some, I don't like the Humours so well, as to wish my self in their places; or else I could Name ye a great many, that are happy, or might be so if they would. But why must I be confined to Aged People?

Lu. That Reason is plain, because you don't know, what the Young Ones may come to.

An. Why might not I hope to Live, as well as Aurelia's Daughter; and end my days as happily, as she is like to do?

Lu. So you may; but pray tell me, how happily that will be? Aurelia's Daughter is a Celebrated Beauty, and has a World of Wit: She is a Lady, rides in a Coach and Six: Her Husband is really a Gentleman, a Man of Sense, that has had University Education, Study'd very well, and yet is Fashionable, without being a Fop; a Man that loves her, and, I believe, is Faithful to her. She has two delicate Boys, and as many fine Girls : They have a fine Ancient Seat in the Country, and a good Building in the noblest Square in England ; keep a Splendid House, and have an Income of Three Thousand a Year, to maintain it. To this, we'll add, that she enjoys all the Pleasures, that can be wish'd for on this side of the Grave.
and

An. You have done her abundance of Justice indeed ; and if you can shew me, in any Single Person, a happiness, that comes up to this, or can be thought an equivalent of what you mentioned, upon my Virginity, Aunt, I'll be a Maid as long as I live.

Lu. This, I say, is her present Condition, and I believe she is now about twenty five Years Old ; but would ye look no farther, and only mind the outside of things ? Three Thousand a Year, is a great deal of Money ; but yet, People may Live above it.

An. But what Reason have you to think they do ?

Lu. He loves Horse-courfing, and she loves Play ; as for her Portion, I am satisfied it is gone already ; and between you and I, Antonia, if you'll go up with me, in my Closet, I can shew you very good Land Security for a Thousand Pound, Lent to somebody : I would not have ye take any notice ; but if such things are done in the beginning, what must be expected hereafter ? They have hitherto, had a Child every Year since they have been Married ; she is Big again ; this may go on to a dozen, for ought you know : Suppose that all these Children shall be Handsome, well Shaped, Sensible, good Humour'd, Humour'd, and Obedient, what Care must not attend the bringing up of so many : But if any of 'em should be Crooked, Blind, marked in the Face, or any other way Deformed; be Idiots, Stubborn, or Undutiful, what a lasting Trouble would this be? We'll say, they shall have no Rickets, Kings-Evil, nor undergo the Miseries of breaking a Leg, an Arm, a Rib; they shall be free from a thousand Accidents, that are daily occasioned by the carelessness of Nurses; but shall they have no Measles, Small-Pox, and other great Fits of Sickness? What Watchings, and Anxieties, if they Live; and if they Die, what heart-breaking Sorrow, and unfeigned Tears, are not prepared for a tender Mother? But we'll grant they shall all grow up to be Men and Women, what a vast Charge will this be, if their Revenue be not sufficient now, whilst they have but Four, that being so Young yet, in a manner Cost nothing, to what they will hereafter? what will become of them, when they shall have a greater Number, and be at the unavoidable Expence of Cloaths and Education? But this is not all, shall none of the Sons take to ill Courses, be Extravagant, unfortunately draw a Quarrel upon him, Kill, or be Kill'd? Shall all the Daughters be well Married, and none of 'em commit a Folly? Do but consider, Antonia, if only one in Twelve, should miscarry, and some way or other be made miserable, that the happiness of Eleven, is not able to make amends for a thousandth part of the Affliction, which that one, that is unhappy, must of necessity Cause to loving Parents. But I'll agree, that

that, by a miracle, they shall all be irreproachable, and do well ; shew me a Fund for the large Sums, which the Men shall require, handsomely to begin the World with ; or tell me, whence the Portions shall arise, that must get Husbands for the Women : What a Comfort must it be to a Lady, that her self has always been Caress'd and Cherish'd, by a Gentleman of an easy indulging Temper, a Man of Parts, of a Soul, and of a Family ; when she sees her Daughter, that she has so carefully, and so sweetly brought up, wait on the vile Humours of an imperious, ill-bred, and sordid Mechanick : And what Delight will it not give to her Husband, to throw away some hundreds of Pounds, to procure one of his Sons the happiness of being made a Slave, for seven Years, to a Miserly Villain of an Usurer ; that in recompence shall spoil his Principles, debase his Mind, and Preach nothing to him but Avarice ; that shall infuse into him, the abominable Rules of reaping the Benefit, and escaping the Punishment of Over-reaching and Extortion. What secret Joy will it not be to his Soul, when he shall hear his own Flesh and Blood, say, Master, to one that from a Parish Boy, by being a Rogue, is come to be Rich ; one, that for ought himself knows, never had a Grandfather ? What a Pleasure must it be to a Mar., as Aurelia's Son-in-Law, when for his Child's sake, he shall be forced to Humour, and shew Respect to such a Fellow, that with a great Paunch, and a Chain about his Neck, shall Strut, Swell to his Face, and Bragging of his ill-got Pelf, impudently Laugh at Pedigrees, Politeness, Honour, and whatever is valuable, and unknown to mean and abject Spirits? All People wish, that every one of their Children may Live as well as themselves, and think it a great Hardship, if at least, the Eldest Son, should after their Deaths, not Live in the same Splendour, and Inherit as Great, and as Clear an Estate, to support the unavoidable Dignity, to which he Succeeds by his Birth, as his Ancestors left to his Father: Can Aurelia's Daughter ever imagine this of her Children? is it probable? nay, is it possible? and do you think, she'll ever Name, her Sons Shop, without Regret, when she speaks that Word?

Ant. Aunt, you are enough to Ruine, and unpeople a Common-Wealth: When yesterday I was Reading, how Sollicitous the Emperor Augustus was, in Stocking of his Empire, what Care and Pains he took, to perswade all Young People to Matrimony, and how he Honoured, and Encouraged such as would Marry, I could not forbear thinking on you: If you had Lived in his Days, and Ventilated this Doctrine, you would certainly have come to some Untimely end or other: I must confess, your Discourse has so touch'd me, that I cannot but admire the Wisdom of Nature, in denying to Men and Women, that Foresight, when they are Young, which they acquire at a greater Age: For without that, I verily believe the World could not Subsist above Three, or Fourscore Years; and a New Creation of Man should be wanted once

once every Hundred Years at least. Tho' as to Aurelia's Daughter, concerning Riches, I am still of Opinion, she can hardly fail of Living well; for besides what she is to have of her Mother, her Joynture, which no Body can touch, will always secure her a Plentiful Maintenance.

Luc. When People Live above their Income, at their first setting out, it seldom ends well: As to her Joynture, it signifies nothing; they are only of use in Matches, that are struck up like Smithfield Bargains, for designing Women, that look upon 'em as Annuities; which by their Portions they have Purchased; such, as take a Husband for a Cloak, and a conveniency of being Wicked with Impunity; that are resolved to part with them, if they won't allow them to be so Vicious as they please: But can a Woman, that Loves her Husband, reserve any thing from him, if he likewise Loves her? Set but the Example of your Mother before your Eyes: She had twice your Fortune, and Fifteen Hundred a Year, Settled upon her, out of 2500 a Year, which your Father had when he Married her; and yet she had the Misfortune, of seeing all that reduced to Nothing, by a Husband, that was Guilty of no Vice, but being too Generous to his Friends, and too Charitable to the Needy: What became of her Joynture, when his Debts made him uneasy? She gave up her Right, and prevented his asking; they neither of them had Mercenary Souls; but so entertained, and plyed one another with Love, and Pleasure: He being Obliging, and She being Grateful, that Care could never enter into either: If she had been Mistress of a Thousand Jointures, they would have been Sacrificed, and all made away with, before she would have seen him one Moment out of Humour: I would not say any thing, to reflect upon the Dead: Mark only the Deplorable End of your Mother; when she Died, she left the Object of her Love, your Father in a Prison; and the Pledges of it, her two Daughters, of which, the Eldest your self, was but Six Years; and the Youngest not a Month Old, no otherwise provided for, than as the Good Will of her Sisters should think fit to Dispose of them. Could this happen to your Mother, that had no Charge of Children, and never more Living, at once than two; how is Aurelia's Daughter Insured against it, that is likely to have so many? If you will Examine into the hints that I gave given ye, it is impossible, but you must see the Black Cloud of Troubles, that is impending over her Head, and may, when ever it Breaks, not Affect only her, but likewise overtake Aurelia herself; whom you now think so happy, and almost beyond the reach of Fortune: She is but a middle Aged Woman, and I can foresee, which way she may yet feel Afflictions, that shall not be Inferiour to the Death of her Son, and go as near to her Heart; such as shall arise from what you have call'd Great,

Great, and Substantial Blessings, of the First Rate. What makes ye Smile?

Ant. I was thinking, how little I must pretend, that I had no Caution given me, if ever I should play the Fool with myself; but there's no great Danger, for thus much you have gain'd upon me, that I am thoroughly Satisfied: Married Women, are infinitely more expos'd to Accidents, that may occasion Trouble, Grief, and Misery, than Maids; and if any Body comes to Court me to Day, he has chose his Time very ill: For I can assure ye, Aunt, that what you have said, has made a great impression upon me; and I would not be Aurelia, nor her Daughter neither.

Luc. And yet I have said nothing of the Personal, and Bodily Sufferings, that attend Matrimony; and, if Women are not Barren, are inseparable from it. I have not spoke of the losing of your Shape, the Fading of your Beauty, which I know you value: When Aurelia's Daughter was a Maid, she was talk'd of every where, for having an extraordinary fine Bosom; let her now compare once her Breasts to yours, and see, which are the firmest. Don't ye observe what little Resistance they make to her Strays, and how they begin to give way to them, when she stoops, or bows forward, to what they did four or five Years ago? Is it not a Thousand pities, to see a Young Brisk Woman, well made, and fine Limb'd? as soon as she is Poyson'd by Man, Reach, Puke, and be Sick, ten or twelve times in a Day, for a Month or Six Weeks; and after that, Swell for Seven or Eight Months together; till, like a Frog, she is nothing else but Belly. Would you not think it hard, to have an uneasiness, that shall last ye Nine Months, which in abundance of Women, is one continued Distemper?

Ant. If these little Disorders of Breeding were the worst, I should not think so much of it; for I see Men and Women both, Laugh at 'em daily.

Luc. So they'll do if any one Scalds his Throat; to let him know, that it was his own Fault, by being so greedy in Swallowing: They don't Laugh at the thing it self, but, the thinking on what has been the Occasion, tickles their Fancies. But what Reason has she, that feels the Smart to Laugh? You call them little Disorders, but, if it was your Case, you'd find 'em perhaps, Great Ones. 'Tis true, all are not bad alike; some are Stronger than others, in resisting Poysons: But if Man was not a Venomous Creature, how would it be possible, that a Flail, Plump Girl, of a good Complexion, should in so little a time, after Conversing with him, turn thin Visaged, Pale, Yellow, and look as if she was Bewitch'd? Not be able to endure the sight of Bread, Loath the best of Food, and in an Instant, get an Aversion to twenty things, which she used to admire before; whilst she'll run Raving Mad for strange, nasty, and unnatural Messes, that no

no Human Stomach, of People in their Senses, ever craved; with an Appetite so uncommon, and unaccountable, that if it be not satished, and she is denied, or any ways hindred in her Frenetick Lulls, she'll Swoon away, be thrown into Convulsions, and such Agonies, as have often proved Fatal: Are not these Signs, that the Venom flies up to the Head? Does it not come up to Demonstration, that the Sting of Man comes up to that of the Tarantula? And that the Symptoms of the first, are more Dreadful, Lasting, and Pernicious, than they are of the latter?
 Are there not hundreds of Women, that from the time, they have been three or four Months with Child, to the Minute they are Delivered, are in such continual Torments, that all that while, they enjoy not one half Nights Rest, or one Hours Ease, in which they can say, they are wholly free from Pain? When they begin to feel this Misery, what an uncomfortable Reflection must it not be? to think, that without hope of Cure, it is to last so many Months; and that then they cannot get rid of it, but by undergoing an uncertain set of Pains; each of which, is a greater Torture, than Dying any other way.
 Mind what I tell ye, Antonia, 'tis not a Trifle; a Pain that racks, distorts, and wrings at one and the same Instant, every Nerve, nay, every Fibre, from the Crown of the Head, to the Sole of the Foot: A Torture so exquisite, and so universal, that Art nor Cruelty, could ever imitate it; and Nature knows not such

such another. When this is over, then begins the Danger : An unconceivable Weariness, seizes the Body all over : The Strength of Muscles and Sinews is spent ; the Organs of Hearing, are become so tender, that the least Noise disturbs their Brain, and the lowest Speech is Offensive ; the very Eye-Strings are strained ; the Sight impair'd, and nothing but Darkness can ease them : And besides, that the Stomach is weak, and for want of Spirits, unable to Digest, the whole Mass of Blood is disordered : We may well imagine ; that missing so many Parts, through which of late it used to Circulate, it cannot easily again confine its self to its Ancient Limits : Being in this Confusion, every small Accident is able to inflame it, and be the Cause of a Fatal Fever. What Numbers have lost their Lives in Child-Bed, your own Mother for one ; a whole Fortnight she was like to do well, and yet Died within the Month.

Ant. Dear Aunt, let me hear no more of it.

Luc. Dear Niece, I am so full of it, my thinks I have said but little yet. I have not spoke of the Faintings, Cramps, the intollerable Head-achs, and violent Cholicks, that are so familiar to them : I have not told ye, what multitudes, tho' they survive, are made Miserable, nor mentioned the Unskillfulness and Neglect of Midwives, or the many Lingring Distempers, and lesser Ailments, that attend some Women as long as they Live : But if this they scape, the Skin will be Wrinkled, the little Capillary Veins, that are so Ornamental to it, must be broke in many places ; the Flesh be loosened, the Ligaments relax'd, the Joynts be stiffen'd, and made unactive: This perhaps you may slight, but be assured, that the Bearing, as well as Bringing forth of Children, walt's Women, wears 'em, shakes, spoils, and destroys, the very Frame and Constitution of them.
and

Ant. I can but thank ye, Aunt, for your Affection; the Zeal you speak with, abundantly convinces me of the Concern you have for me; tho' I have not understood some hard Words, and several things you have Named, by which, I fancy you have Learned to be a Midwife, and Studied Surgery.

Luc. I have read several Books of Physick, and abundance of things, that Women seldom trouble their Heads with; but I always was of Opinion, that in knowing the World, was comprehended the understanding of ones Self; and think, that the Study of Anatomy, and the inward Government of our Bodies, is as diverting, and fully of as much use, as the contriving, and making the best ordered, and most exact piece of Fillegrew Work, that ever was seen; and I'm sure, what I know of the first, has not cost me half the Time, that I have known People, when I was Young, bestow upon the latter.

An. It is wonder, that since you have been so Curious, in examining all these things, that belongs to Men and Women, it never came into your Head, to confirm your Knowledge by Experience.

Luc. I understand ye very well Niece, you mean, why I did not Marry? I hate Experiments that are Dangerous, and would rather be Ignorant in some things, than run Mad for knowing too much.

Ant. I understanding could not be obtained

An. I Believe that the Pangs, and other Bodily Calamities, are very dreadful to Women, that have Children, and that the ill Consequences are many: All this, and whatever else you told me, bear a great Weight with me; yet I don't doubt, but there are equivalents of Pleasure, and something must be very inviting in Matrimony, or else, why should all Young People have such a mind to it? And why should Nature, as soon as they are fit for it, so much prompt, and set them on to it?

Lu. What prompted you five Years ago, to Eat Cinders, and bits of Wall?

An. That was a depraved Appetite, a Distemper.

Lu. Who told ye, that this is not? May I not say of an Anglers Bait, what you say of Marriage? There must be something very inviting in it, or else the Fishes would not Catch at it so greedily. You and I may talk of this, till we lose our selves; but no Body shall ever perswade me, to be in love with the Bait, if I know that I must swallow the Hook at the same time.

An. But then do you think there would be Pleasure, if it was not for the Hook?

Lu. That's another Question: I never was Married, I can't tell, that Experience is not to be had at my rate; would you have any Body try, whether the Ice was strong enough, to bear him, if he saw People fall in before him?

An. That's Cold Simile in Summer.

Lu. I thought it was a good one; but if you you please, I'll give ye another, that shall be fitter for the Weather, as well as your Constitution; would he have me pay for my Curiosity, as Pliny did, and perish by the Flames, to know the Cause of them.

An. The Application is plain, if Matrimony be like a Vesuvius, and Men are made of Brimstone: But two or three Days ago you promised to tell me, whence that first Aversion, you have to Men, proceeded; pray be as good as your Word, for since you had the same Inclinations, as others, I want to know, what Curb'd them: You was always a great Fortune, and I believe, without Flattery, very agreeable, when you was Young. What could frighten ye from Wedlock? What could inspire you with those unnatural Notions, you have now?

Lu. Love, and Reason.

An. What, Aunt, was you ever in Love?

Lu. Yes, with my self: I always was so Unnatural, as to deny my Appetite, what my Reason told me would hurt me, tho' my Inclination was never so strong: By what I have heard, and seen, I am convinced, that cold, and large Draughts, are prejudicial in Fevers; and therefore, when I am ill, I chuse to bear the Torment of Drought, rather than Endanger my Life.

An. But all this while I am not able to discover, what Thoughts, what Sentiments, you harbour about Men; most commonly, you speak ill of them, and seem to hate them; and yet some-sometimes, you talk of them with Esteem, and extol them to the Skies.

Lu. I Judge of things, as I find them, without being influenced by my Love, or my Hatred; I have an aversion to Men, and yet can admire their Parts, and good Qualities, in which they excel us: And as there is nothing more foolish, tho' few things more practised, than for People, to let their Inclination interfere with their Reason; I have always endeavour'd to avoid it: my hatred to Man, is built on the same Foundation, with the Enmity, and Ill-will, which all Wise Princes, and States of Christendom, bear to the King of France: They know, he is a Sagacious Man of profound Sense, that has had time to join a prodigious Experience, to a Solid Judgment; a Prince of incredible Application, and indefatigable in Business: Every one of them knows, that he is infinitely more Powerful, than himself.

An. Are these the Sentiments, that the Princes have of the King of France?

Lu. Depend upon it, they are; and I could tell ye abundance more, of his Heroick Patience, and Steadiness in Misfortunes, if it was to my purpose.

An. I can never think this is his Character; if it was, instead of all Combining against him, they would treat him with a great deal of Veneration.

Lu. Why so? what are his Personal Qualities? what is his Greatness to them, as long as it is manifest, he would make them his Vassals? would you not have him execrate an Ambi-

Ambitious Monarch, that has nothing of Religion, but what his Politicks direct? that Laughs at Oaths, and Solemn Promises, and knows nothing Binding, but his Interest? Should they not Hate and Detest him, when it is so visible, that he would bring all Europe under his Yoak, and breaks through all Laws, Human and Divine, to have his Will? They have Learn'd by woful Experience, that often he has been too Strong, for three or four of the most Potent; and that commonly, he is too Cunning for them altogether; but the greater his Abilities are, the more they ought to be apprehended: If Singly, they cannot Face him, and knock him down fairly; are they not in the right, to fall upon him with united Force, as they do, and rather worry the Common Enemy into Ruine, than suffer themselves to be Enslaved by him?

An. Then it seems the King of France, has given those Princes, and States, great Provocations; and it is very reasonable, they should be his Enemies. What has Mankind done to you? have they made War against ye? how have they deserved your Hate?

Lu. They have Enslaved our Sex: In Paradise, Man and Woman were upon an even foot; see what they have made of us since: is not every Woman that is Married, a Slave to her Husband; I mean, if she be a good Woman, and values her Promise.

An. If you was in other Countries, perhaps you might have Reason to complain; but in England, England, Women are treated very Respectfully, as well as Tenderly.

Lu. 'Tis that Respect, and Tenderness I hate, when it consists only in outward shew: In Holland Women sit in their Counting-houses, and do Business, or at least are acquainted with every thing their Husbands do. But says a Rascal here, no, my Dear, that is too much Trouble; those Butter-Boxes don't know, how to treat Ladies; Men should only study, how to give 'em Pleasure: With this he sends her to the Play-House; and when she comes Home, there's an Extent out against her Husband, all what they have in the World is gone, and they tear the very Rings from the Lady's Fingers, that was so respected an Hour ago. Is not this enough to make a Woman run Mad.

An. But pray, if a Man be great in the World, and receives any Honour, does not the Wife partake of it; and is she not esteem'd accordingly?

Lu. So do the Servants too; all the Family commonly fares the better for the Masters Grandeur; I have thought sometimes, the very Horses have run merrily, when I have seen 'em draw a Favourite's Coach: But I have no mind to tell ye the hundredth part now, of what I have to say to ye upon this Head. I'll shew ye one thing, that perhaps may make ye love the Sex; pray see, what fine Thoughts they have of us, and how they derive our inconstancy, from Eve our Mother.

An. Would ye have me Read it aloud?

Lu. Yes, if you will, Antonia.

When

When Adam saw the Beauty by his Side,
 With new-born Joy, he view'd the charming Bride :
 Her, whom he knew on no small Errand sent,
 Because procur'd by the Omnipotent.
 But if he lik'd, and lov'd her eagerly,
 Impatient to enjoy the Heav'nly She,
 As for her Part, shew'd no great Cruelty.
 And Adam quickly found, much for our Good,
 That she was made of the same Flesh and Blood.
 Both gaz'd, both were surpriz'd ; and as they ey'd
 With wishful Looks, what neither strove to hide,
 Both equally o'ercome, by diff'rent Charms,
 Rush'd, without Courtship, to each others Arms :
 Dissolv'd at once, and shot thro' ev'ry Vein,
 Felt all the Joys of Love, without the Pain.
 On her it work'd with greater Influence,
 Than all her Daughters e'er could boast of since.
 Sure, Friend, this happy Fair, who never knew
 The Intrigues of Church or Play-house, must be true.
 Was ever Woman honest, it was she ;
 Perhaps you'll say, she was forced so to be :
 There were no other Men, and being alone,
 'Twas Hopson's Choice, she must have him, or none.
 We are both mistaken, and shall not perceive,
 If we mind well, such Innocence in Eve ;
 For tho' her Sponse was of such noble Mien,
 Of Shape so graceful, and of Limbs so clean,
 With Vigor, Eloquence, and Knowledge blest,
 And without doubt, not wanting of the rest,
 Unless a Man, fram'd by immortal Skill,
 To stock the World, could be thought furnish'd ill ;
 Yet of the nuptial Bow'r she weary grew,
 And as she lov'd, still long'd for something new :
 And tho' at Home she had a Lord so great,
 That even Angels enviy'd him his State ;

*Yet, as a Husband, she could leave him there,
In hopes to meet with other Joys elsewhere;
And once got out of Sight, she prov'd so frail,
That she would listen to a Serpent's Tale,
And rather enter with the Dev'l in Chat,
Than be a Woman, and not be Coquet.*

Lu. How do you like it ?

An. I could hang the Author with all my Heart; but, according to your Rule, I must say thus of it, 'There is a witty Turn upon poor Eve; some Lines are very strong, but they are as much inclin'd to be bawdy, or else the whole is writ pretty well; and I must hate the Author for striving to expose our Sex.'

Lu. Right: So I would have you judge of every Thing according to the Merits. Come, Antonia, I don't like your Yawning; rather than be idle, let you and I play a Game at Chess.

An. I can't, unless you give me a Rook.

Lu. Why don't you ask for the Queen? Come, any Thing.

THE SEVENTH DIALOGUE

BETWEEN

Lucinda and Antonia.

Lucinda, IF I am not mistaken, Niece, you have eat with a better Appetite than you did Yesterday: How does your Dancing-bout agree with you?

Antonia, I thank you for your Advice, Aunt; I am much better than I was: But don't you think it dangerous, to trust me among so many handsome young Fellows?

Lu. Much less, than where there is but one or two; because the Objects jostle out one another, and none can make a deep Impression.

An. That may be; but when they handle me about, and I am so close to 'em, as one is oblig'd to be in Country-Dances, it makes a strange Commotion within me, in spite of my Teeth: At first of all it is as if it would stifle me, and takes away my Breath.

Lu. That is because it is sweet, and the Men draw it. Did you never hear of Cats sucking the Breath of Children?

An. But, without bantering, Aunt, did you ever observe that in your self? It is only in the Beginning; as soon as I am tir'd a little, it goes off.

Lu. When I was young, without doubt, I was as the rest: But don't be troubl'd at it; the more you frequent great Companies, the sooner it will wear off. Do but keep 'em from Reasoning, and being alone with you, and you are safe; for I never fear your falling in Love at Sight. I know, that being so near 'em, as well as the Wantonness of the Motion it self, by making an Agitation in the Blood, stirs up the Thoughts, and raises some hidden Wishes; but the same Motion long continu'd, by dissipating the Spirits, will lay 'em again, and you'll always find your self easier after it.

An. I did as you bid me, and tir'd my self heartily; we made it past two. No Body can follow Directions more strictly, than I do yours. Did you see me touch a Drop of Gravy at Dinner?

Lu. I was glad of it. Dear Niece, do but use your self to a slender, or at least a plain Diet, and take a great deal of Exercise; always strive to be merry, and never be idle. Observe but these Things, and the Men may go whistle.

An. Now you talk of Men, I can't forbear thinking of the King of France; I never heard a Man prais'd, and spoke against, so much at the same Time.

Lu. I could tell you abundance more.

An. Why won't you, Aunt? I wonder at you; every Cbler and Tinker talks Politicks. Our Tom and the Coach-man were at it the Night beforelast, 'till they were ready to quarrel.

rel. I am sure, I know as much as they : You always make me read the News, and look every Place in the Map, and yet you'll never talk to me about State-Affairs.

Lu. That is, because you are not fit for it, nor I neither, indeed : Those that would meddle with 'em, ought to have not only read, but digested all manner of History, that they may be ready to compare what is present, with what has been ; and be able, upon every Accident, allowing for the Difference of Time and Place, to judge of the Event of Things to come.

An. You have read a great deal, and I have read a little, Aunt.

Lu. To be vers'd in History, is but one Branch ; there is more requisite. A Politician that would pretend to fore-see what shall happen, ought to be acquainted with other Countries, as well as he is with his own, to know the great Cities, their Commerce, the Sea-ports, their Shipping, the Fortifications, Artillery, Stores, and Ammunition ; all the Towns of Note, the Number of Villages, and People they contain ; the Soil, the Climate, the Extent and Product of every Province ; some of these Things are very difficult to be learn'd. The ablest People in our Nation, when we had gain'd that glorious Victory over the French at Hockstedt, did not think it would ever have been in the Power of France to lose such a Battel as that of Ramillies ; much less, that they could have made all those Shifts, and that great Resistance with which hitherto they have oppos'd the Conquests of the wisest Generals, and the bravest Soldiers.

An. To know what you speak of in all the Countries of Europe, would take up more than one Man's Life-time.

Lu. This is not all ; he ought likewise to know the Prince, and all his Court, or at least his chief Ministers and Generals, their Abilities, Circumstances, and Inclinations, all their Vertues and Vices.

An. And do you think that there are many that have this universal Knowledge?

Lu. No: And that is the Reason why all People guess so madly, and are so much out of the Way, when they are Fools enough of giving their Opinion of what is to come. Let a Man be of the greatest Learning, Sense, and Perspicacity, if he wants this Knowledge, at least of the Countries in Question, I would value his Predictions about Peace or War, or the Alliances of Princes, no more than yours, tho' he was one of the Managers.

An. Since there are so few that can boast of this vast Knowledge, I can't think that there is a Folly in passing one's Judgment on Things, of which there is no Certainty, if it be modestly done. When a Question is ask'd, People must say something; no Body loves to seem altogether ignorant.

Lu. And yet nothing shews more Candor and Ingenuity, than when a Man of Parts confesses his Ignorance; especially in Things of Moment, that require Pains and Labour.

An. I think it looks very affectedly, for People to pretend not to understand a Thing, when all the World knows they excel in it.

Lu. I don't mean that coxcomby Way of Humility, by which your insipid People pretend tend to be ignorant of what themselves, as well as others, are perswaded that they are Masters: As some that can sing well, will foolishly tell you, that they have no Skill, or no Voice, or else that they are hoarse; when themselves and every Body else know the contrary. I speak of that shining Quality, when People of Sense, that understand their Business thoroughly, and are great Proficients in the Studies to which they have apply'd themselves, without Hesitation, own their Ignorance of what they really don't know.

An. I should think that's soon done.

Lu. It is so in such as your self; but to People of Parts and Learning, that are of some Fame, it is harder than you think; for when they begin to see that they are generally taken for knowing Persons, their Pride makes 'em such Fools as to fancy they shall persuade the World, that they know every Thing; which is ridiculous; and this is the Reason why I think it silly for People to make Prognostications in Politicks, when they are conscious in their own Hearts, that they know nothing of it.

An. I can very well perceive, that it is a Fault to meddle with Things we don't understand; but why is it such a Beauty to confess that we are ignorant?

Lu. 'Tis a Sign of good Breeding, and a sort of fair Dealing, when Persons, that have not ill bestow'd their Time, scorn to appear more knowing than they really are. When I speak to any Body that is always us'd ingenuously to tell me when he don't understand or know a Thing, it ~~aspires~~ ^{inspires} me with a greater Confidence in his Knowledge, when he undertakes a Thing, or when he says nothing.

An. Then I find I must ask you no Questions about State-Affairs, because you want those necessary Qualifications, which are so difficult to be attain'd to, that People may be extraordinary well accomplish'd, and yet be wholly to seek in them.

Lu. You have hit it; they are so difficult, that it is an Accomplishment to know all the Difficulty of it. It is very hard in some Countries to be well acquainted with the hidden Springs that give Life to the several Courts of Justice; the several Pullies, by the Help of which, the Money is hoisted up from the very Bottom to the Top, as well as the many Holes thro' which it is suffer'd to drop down again, with the Wheels that turn it, and all the other Parts that compose the Machine of Government. Travellers have not Time for it, and seldom troubling their Heads with the Inside, are commonly satisfy'd, if they can but see the Engine play. Those that make it their Business, and enquire into it, are often impos'd upon, by addressing themselves to People that pretend to know more than they do.

An. I believe it is a great Task to know those Things; but why should you suppose what you said last?

Lu. I have a great Reason for it, and speak by Experience: A Man that understands himself very well, may be employ'd in one Part of a Government, and yet not know some Things in another Part that is remote from his; or at least, not always exactly remember what is out of his Way. But yet, if a Stranger should, among other

ther Questions, ask him something about a Court, or Office, which he happens not to know, if he is a Man of any Figure, and the Stranger likewise one, whose Esteem he values, he'll be ashamed to own his Ignorance, and will often tell him wrong, rather than be thought, by a Man of Sense, not to know a Thing belonging to a Government, in which he is concern'd himself. We had a Man, that has left us very valuable Remarks made of a neighbouring Country: He is generally very exact in the Description of their Government; yet, tho' he was a great Statesman, a Light of the Age, that was an Ambassador there, and liv'd a great while upon the Spot, I can shew you, in his Writings, what could not be there, unless he had been misinform'd. The seven united Provinces are very near; there is a very strict Alliance between them and us, and both actually shew, at this present Time, such an unparallel'd Confidence in one another, as never was seen before between two such powerful Neighbours, of so different an Interest in Trade; and yet, though we have so great a Commerce with them, how few People have we here, that exactly understand their Government! The Prints may mention the States of Holland, the Court of Holland, and the Court of Brabant; speak of the States General, the Council of State, or the committed Council; but most People can only tell you, that they are several Courts and Assemblies: If you ask 'em what sort of Ministers they are compos'd off, and their Numbers, or what is the proper Business for each Place, few can answer with any Exactness; and I know some Persons of good Sense, and even of Quality, that that have no clearer Notion of 'em, tho' they are next Door to us, than they have of the Mandarins in China; and what is worse, think themselves no more oblig'd to know the one, than the other, to judge of State-Affairs. They read of the hundred Penny, but there are abundance of People that know no more of it, than that it is a certain Tax so call'd, but what Part of their Income it is, they are altogether ignorant of. If they knew what that Tax meant, a great many that grumble at paying four Shillings in the Pound, would not so much expose themselves by complaining, that the Dutch contribute not proportionably to the War, as much as themselves; when they should see, that by paying the hundred Penny twice a Year, as they have done for some Time, they give away just half their Revenue; and that this they pay not only of their Land and Houses, (which the Country being so small) are inconsiderable to their other Riches; but likewise that, in which their Wealth chiefly consists, the Money that from Time to Time they lend the Government, tho' the Province of Holland allows no higher Interest than four per Cent. And now I am speaking of this, I cannot but think, that if our People should know what other Taxes, heavy Excises, and innumerable Duties they pay besides, not only upon Wine, Beer, Fuel, and others, that we have, but such as are unheard of here; as upon the keeping of Servants, the grinding of ~~Corn~~, which is terrible to the poor, Butter, &c. If, I say, some of our People should know how they are oblig'd to pay certain Sums, at which they are rated for using Salt, and Soap, whether they consume little or much; how every Family, ly, that will drink Tea, Coffee, or Chocolate, must pay a great Tax for it, tho' they had but one Dish of any of the three in the whole Year: Should they consider all this, and that the very Cows pay for having Horns, they would think our Burden much lighter than theirs, and cry out, Blessed England!

An. Blessed Great Britain, you mean, Aunt.

Lu. That is no Proverb yet, Niece.

An. I can contradict nothing of what you have said; but I must ask you one Question, since, according to your Description, it is an utter Impossibility that there should be a perfect Politician: Why would you insinuate, as if some People were to blame for not being so?

Lu. To be well vers'd in a Science, is one Thing, and to be perfect in it, is another. I don't believe, more than you, that there is any one Man that knows all those Things which I have nam'd, of all the principal Kingdoms and Commonwealths of Europe; but there may be such as are very well acquainted with one or two Countries, besides their own, and know a great deal of the rest, and thus he ought to be qualify'd, that from present Circumstances, can pretend to give a tolerable Guess of what shall happen hereafter. This was the Reason why I told you, that you nor I were fit to talk of Politicks; because I know that by talking of em, you mean foretelling what is to come. But as these Predictions are very unprofitable, considering what Accomplishments they require, I see no Necessity why one Man should be put to all that Trouble: It is enough that all the Court and the whole Government of a Nation can make up such an exact Body of Politicks as I have mention'd; mention'd; which yet it is a Shame that any gallant Kingdom, or State, that makes a Bu-ttle in the World, should want. The King of France has whole Sets of 'em, that study some one Country, and some another, as appears in all his Negotiations.

An. Yes, yes, Aunt, I know the King of France is a great Man with you.

Lu. The more you jest with that, the more I'll be in earnest. I know that Lewis the XIVth is a wicked Tyrant, and so may I prosper, as I wish his Fall. This hinders me not, but I can observe his wonderful Atchievements. In Feats of War, he has out-done Alexander and Cesar both; in encouraging Learning, and promoting all Arts and Sciences, in embellishing his Kingdom, and polishing his Nation, he has exceeded Augustus, and shew'd himself both at Home and Abroad, a deeper Politician than Tiberius.

An. You talk of Alexander, and Cesar; Lewis the XIVth never was fam'd for personal Valour.

Lu. You talk of a Trifle, a Quality that may fall in every unthinking, fool-hardy Fellow, that has more Pride than Fear. Courage by it self, if it be a Vertue, is a very unregarded one. How many brave Fellows have we lost these two last Wars, by Sea and Land, that were forgot, before they were quite cold? 'Tis a good Encomium to a private Soldier, to tell him, that he is stout, resolute, and undaunted; and perhaps it may do as far as a Captain; but if you come higher, where they must be either People of great Birth, or else such that have convers'd with Gentlemen a great while, and are personal

are us'd to Danger; there it is not suppos'd they can want it.

An. How! not suppos'd?

Lu. No, not in Armies; for if a young Officer be a Coward, he is soon found out, and then he is baited as much as a Bear at a Stake; for he presently becomes the Object of every Youngster that would shew his Valour at a cheap Rate; so that he is either cuff'd or beat into Courage, or else, if he be not knock'd o'th' Head, forc'd to quit the Game, and lay down his Soldiership, before he can be advanc'd. In a great Officer, it is look'd upon as the least of his Qualifications; but to tell a General, one that commands an Army, that he has Courage, is a very insipid Compliment; the Reason is, because, to make up a good one, a great many other Accomplishments are requir'd, more valuable than Courage, because they are infinitely more scarce, and some very hard to be met with. Most of our Country Fellows, when they are us'd to the Fire, will run up to the Mouth of a Cannon, and yet I don't see they are treated with abundance of Respect for it.

An. I don't know how little you may esteem 'em, but the best General in the World would be very insignificant without 'em.

Lu. No more than a great Architect without Bricklayers, Masons, Carpenters, &c. and don't you think it would be a strange Compliment to Sir Ch. Wren, to tell him, that he was not only a great Man in contriving and giving the necessary Orders for such a noble Fabrick as Paul's, but that likewise he could lay a Brick as well as the best of 'em? If it be unwise in a General to run the Danger of a Captain, or a Colonel; would it not be foolish in him to be expos'd at all? The Princes, that have been fam'd for Courage, had commonly no more than one great Army, in which, their All was at Stake, and no Body they could trust with the Management of 'em, as well as themselves. Lewis the XIVth has train'd up, by his Care, great Numbers of Generals, that are fit to command; and his vast Genius heads half a Score Armies at once, whilst he sits in his Closet, and sends necessary Orders to 'em all. Alexander and Cesar together never had half his Business upon their Hands. The Invention of the Funds, the raising of Money, and the continual patching up the broken Credit of France, require great Abilities, and take up abundance of Time. Alexander's Soldiers liv'd upon the Plunder of the Countries they conquer'd: Those of Cesar did either the same, or else were furnish'd by those Provinces of the Empire that were of his Side, or other Countries that were his Friends. Alexander subdu'd whole Kingdoms in less Time than our Armies with all their Artillery and Ammunition could march thro' 'em.

An. Was his Glory not the greater, the sooner he obtain'd his Victories?

Lu. No, unless he had found greater Opposition than he did. Had Porus been an Eugene, or Darius a Marlborough, the Persians been Englishmen, and the Indians Dutch-men, or Germans, Alexander might have liv'd to be fourscore, before he should have had Occasion to be concern'd for what he cry'd for at thirty.

An. You can't say the same of Cesar, his Romans had Romans to fight with; and Pompey, before

And success in his long

fore he lost the Battel of Pharsalia, was fully as great a General every way as himself.

Lu. That's true, and therefore you see one decisive Battle did Pompey's Business; he was not able to lose a Ramellies after his Hockstedt.

An. I cannot be of your Opinion, and am more pleas'd with one single Action of Alexander, than with all what the King of France has done in his Life-time.

Lu. We don't talk of being pleas'd; the King of France never pleas'd me at all, but of late, when he has given us an Opportunity to beat him.

An. I mean, where Alexander throws himself from the Wall of the City, in the midst of his Enemies, and fights all alone against so many, after he is wounded: There, I say, he shew'd more Gallantry than Lewis the XIVth ever did, or will do as long as he lives.

Lu. I can't tell very well, how it was in Alexander's Time, but if a General, that commands an Army in chief, should do so now, I know what he should deserve; if it was left to me, I would send for the first Surgeon that could be got.

An. You jest, Aunt; I don't mean as to his Wounds.

Lu. No, nor I neither; I did not so much as think on 'em.

An. What would you do with the Surgeon then?

Lu. To have him blooded, and his Head shav'd; and after that, I would put him in a dark Room, with clean Straw in it.

An. Ohabominable! What! would you treat him like a mad Man?

Lu.

Lu. Without doubt; for, I believe, no Body would think him to be otherwise. Can a Man be thought in his Wits, to expose the Lives of so many thousands, in a manner only depended upon his?

An. At that Rate, you have but little Respect for the most gallant Prince of the Age, the King of Sweden.

Lu. You never heard me say so; I have a great Respect for all Kings.

An. But if Courage be worth nothing, why is Cowardice counted so despicable in Princes?

Lu. I never said Courage was not to be esteem'd, but I would not have you over-value it. It is a Happiness to have all our Bones form'd and plac'd as they should be; but do you think, because it is a high Reflexion upon crook'd People, to upbraid 'em with their Shape; that, in Proportion, it is as great a Compliment, to tell others, that they are strait?

An. That is, because most People are strait.

Lu. And so most Princes have Courage; their lofty Education; and the Pride they are inspir'd with, bend 'em so powerfully that Way, that they are next to Monsters if they want it. But what makes you think the King of France is a Coward?

An. Because he don't Care for fighting himself.

Lu. I have answer'd that already; but I know I can't convince you; the reading of Romances has too much spoil'd your Judgment.

An. No, Aunt; I am not such a Fool neither, as to believe, People are to be cleft asunder at a Blow.

Lu.

Lu. I have heard you defend the Character of Almaraz in the Conquest of Gamaia, and that is worse.

An. That's long ago; but yet I believe one may have an Aversion against Cowardice, without being a Don Quixot.

Lu. But then you should not be so rash. Fighting is not the only Thing that shews Courage. The French King's Enterprize upon Europe, when no Body disturb'd him, the Fortitude with which he has bore his Disgraces, and the Intrepidity he has shewn in the repairing of his Losses, are great Signs of Magnanimity; and Qualities that are inconsistent with the Nature of a Coward.

An. Then I'll have done with his Courage; but you said several other fine Things of him, that I can't find out. What Encourager of Arts and Learning he has been, I can't tell; but that, by his Ambition, his Kingdom is reduc'd to a miserable Condition, we hear from all Parts: How flourishing it has been, I don't know; but I remember, when I was a little Girl, you told me your self, that the Country People in France were very poor, and for the Generality, wore wooden Shoes. As for his Politicks, I don't understand 'em; tho' I believe, by what I have heard People say, that he has been as often baffl'd, and out-witted, as any Prince in Europe. Truly, I don't think what he did last Year, was a very cunning Trick, when, knowing that five English-men can beat ten French-men at any Time, he sent five thousand Men to invade us. And then the Persecution of his Protestant Subjects, all the World says, was a great Over-sight; nay, my own Reason can tell me, that losing so many Men, must weaken a Kingdom. Besides, a great many that would have fought his Battels, are daily, with Success, employ'd against him; thousands have been sent to the Gallies, thousands have been dragoon'd, and hundred thousands have fled to other Countries. If you say, these were Protestants, and them he hated; then pray see how well the Roman Catholicks far'd, whom he lov'd? Several hundred thousands have been kill'd long ago, all fighting in an unjust Cause: The Soldiers, that have escap'd being knock'd o'th' Head, are starv'd; strain upon their Landlords for their Pay; and, by being so often beaten, are become Cowards into the Bargain. In the Cities, the greatest Bankers are broke, the lesser Merchants are like to follow: In the Country, the Gentry are exhausted by Taxes; abundance of Villages are desolate, and in the rest, they want Bread. And all this by the great Care their politick King has taken in imbellishing his Kingdom, and making his People flourish. If these be his Politicks, the Lord preserve us from such Politicians!

Lu. Amen, with all my Soul. You have taken a great deal of Pains, Niece; but since you have exerted your self with so much Zeal, I'll endeavour to make good my Assertions, and take the Trouble to answer you at large. First, as to his Politicks: I should wonder why you have only pick'd out two Instances, and such as are not very plain, and may be disputed, when you might have nam'd a great many, by which, it is as clear as the Sun, that the King of France has taken wrong Measures! I should wonder at this, I say but that I know it is for want want of being acquainted with the Transactions of Europe. But since you cannot be a Judge of what you don't know, I'll answer only what you have mention'd.

An. But, with your Leave, Aunt, I don't think that is fair; for, by so doing, you shall only gain your Point for want of Opposition: If you would hold your Argument without any Sophistry, and in Reality, assert what you have said; you ought, where the King of France has been out, to take Notice of it your self, or else inform me.

Lu. Do I not take Notice of it sufficiently, when I own, that he has been often in the wrong? It would be too tedious to relate those several false Steps, and would do you no good. To have taken wrong Measures, makes no Prince a bad Politician, when it appears, that he has taken more substantial good ones. The King of France has several times shot wide of the Mark; but if you consider the Vastness of his Undertakings, the Multitude of his Negotiations, and that great Concern he has had for fifty Years in most of the Courts of Europe, it will be difficult to find a Prince of half his Standing, and that has had but a quarter Part of his Business, that has committed so few Errors in Politicks, as himself. Besides, that a great many Things prove unsuccessful at the End, that were well concerted at the Beginning.

An. But that I hope may be said of the one, as well as of the other.

Lu. It may so: Politicks are no mathematical Demonstrations. In the Event of Things, you may see, that very minute Accidents, which to all Appearance were inconsiderable derable Trifles when they happen'd, have often given strange Turns to Affairs at a long Run. These Accidents are no where more frequent, than in Sieges, and Campaigns. Last Year I was once prepar'd to receive the unwelcome News of the Siege of Lisle's being rais'd, and yet you see that important City has been taken, and we have made a glorious Campaign.

An. I believe there is a Snake in the Grass.

Lu. Why?

An. Tell me really, Aunt, would you not, by what you have said, insinuate, that it was more Luck than Cunning, that we took it, and by that eclipse the Glory of our Generals?

Lu. No indeed; and I wonder, when you see I am so nice in giving what is due to our greatest Enemy, you can suspect, that I intend to detract, and sully the Honour of our greatest Friends! I am none of those; and far from it: I was going to say, that, as soon as our People saw a little Hint in the Gazette, which indeed I did not like myself, they were ready to open their Mouths. I would have told you how unjustly our Nation (the greatest Part of which, never yet esteem'd a General a Minute longer than his Success lasted) would have grumbld if we had miss'd of our Aim; and yet the Conduct, Care, and Vigilance of our Generals might have been the same, tho' we had miscarry'd.

An. The Reason why I thought you came in with an Inucendo, was, because I remember that at the Time you speak of, you was of Opinion, that they met with far greater Opposition than they had expected at first.

Lu. I am so still; nay, I'll say more, I believe they never would have undertaken it, if they had.

had fore-ſeen what Difficulties they had to ſurmount.

Ar. And is not that ſullying the Glory of that Action?

Lu. No: It is an unpardonable Fault in a General, to be ignorant of what may happen; but no Body can be blam'd for not always fore-ſeeing what ſhall happen. As by Example, you and I lay a handſome Wager, which of us ſhall get ſoonest to the upper-end of the Orchard; in the Middle of our Race, you fall down, and hurt your Leg; when you ſee me out-ſtrip you, whiſt you feel the Pain, and are uncertain how Running will agree with you afterwards, I believe you'd wiſh that you had not laid the Wager; but far from yielding it loſt, you get up again, and exerting your ſelf almoſt beyond your Strength, you overtake me, and at laſt become the Conqueror, and are half a Yard before me. Of the Standers by, ſome, that love to find Fault, would ſay thus: Well, Antonia has won much ado, but ſhe has run a great Hazard; once I was afraid ſhe had loſt it, and I believe, ſhe thought ſo her ſelf: Sure, ſhe did not know her Aunt could run ſo well; 'twas very imprudent to venture ſo much Money upon ſuch a doubtful Matter; but it was a ſtrange Oversight, not to think ſhe might have a Fall, when they are ſo common to People that run in long Coats. And thus, without mentioning your Nimbleneſs or Reſolution, they would blame you for laying the Wager; but an impartial Judge would tell 'em, that my Coats were as long as yours, that being younger and ſtronger than your Aunt, you had been much in the right to catch at an even Bet, where you had such an Advantage, and that your not fore-seeing the Accident that made the Wager so doubtful, only proceeded from the little Reason you had at sitting out, to think that you should fall, and was no Argument of your being so silly, as not to know that you could fall : He'd say, perhaps, that I had ran better than could have been expected, but that all that redounded to your Glory, who had out-done me, the Disadvantage of a Fall notwithstanding : He would add, that tho' you had undergone more Trouble than I, by gaining the Prize, you was over-paid for your Pains ; whilst your poor Aunt, by over-straining her self, had very near suffer'd as much as you, and would be stiff and unable to stir for a good while after. Those Similes cannot be so exact every where, but you understand my Meaning.

An. Yes, Aunt, I do, and I believe it will hold very well ; if our Generals, when they undertook the Siege of Lisb, had no more Reason to apprehend the Difficulties they unexpectedly met with, than I would fear a Fall in an Orchard I am so well acquainted with.

Zu. I believe they met with Difficulties, of which there was not a tenth Part of the Probability that they would happen, and that they were prepar'd against several that were much more to be fear'd, and did not happen at all. War is full of Chance ; but all Circumstances duly weigh'd, the Probability of Victory is a sufficient Warrant for Action ; and could the Scheme of a great Enterprize come up to the Certainty of Demonstration, the Thing it self would cease to be an Enterprize ; and, what Glory

Glory soever there might be in the Contrivance, there would be none in the Execution. As to the Siege I speak of, it is ridiculous to suppose that such a matchless Brace of Generals, that had so much Reputation to lose, both fortunate Men, that without envying one another, went Hand in Hand, the one to carry on, and the other cover it, should undertake a Thing of that Moment, without having a solid Foundation to hope for, and almost a moral Assurance of Success; more especially, when they had the Assistance, as well as the Consent of the wary Dutch, that are so consummate in the Knowledge, not only of every Inch of the Ground, but every Circumstance that can be hop'd or fear'd in that Country, and so cautious, even to a Fault, (as we think) of exposing their own.

An. This is something like, Aunt; I love to hear you talk so, and am glad, that the Justification of the French Politicks, ends in a Panegyrick upon our Generals.

Lu. I am satisfy'd, Antonia, you do not know my Aim; a Panygerick is a study'd Piece of Flattery; why should you think me guilty of it? I am worth 30000 l. a Woman, and a Lover of Liberty; you'll find your self much mistaken: I made this Digression upon the Siege of Lisle, to serve for an Answer to the first of the Faults you found with the French Politicks.

An. I don't understand what you mean, or how that is possible.

Lu. I can't help that: From what I have said may be gather'd, that the best concerted Measures, since they may meet with Disappointments, are always liable to the Chicanery of Criticks, I have given you an Instance; how, by unexpectedly intervening Rubs, the very Success of a well-grounded Undertaking, may plausibly be cavell'd at by those that think, but can't or won't think deep enough; and this might have taught you, that we ought not to judge of any Event, before we are very well instructed of the Motives of him that began the Action.

An. But won't you speak no plainer?

Lu. No: In the last Year's Invasion, there are some Things very mysterious to the Publick, and a good Subject ought not to rip up, or at least, not be particular in, and speak at large, of what might contribute either to the Shame or the Grief of his Country.

An. This is no Answer at all, Aunt.

Lu. Then I'll give you the Argument; and rather than say what I would not own, that this was one of the false Steps the King of France has made in Politicks; and we'll grant that the Enterprize was built upon a weak and ridiculous Ground; but you'll give me Leave to pray, that no Enemy to Great Britain may ever have a better, and Lewis the XIVth never such another. Having allow'd you this, I'll go on to the next; and now let us see what must be thought of the French King's persecuting his Protestant Subjects? He fore-saw, without doubt, that some of 'em would help to augment our Armies; and so did we know, that by discountenancing of Popery, a great many disaffected Britains, and Irish-men, would fall in with the King of France; but I believe few People think, that in his Armies they can do so much Hurt to the Nation, as if they were here;

or that an English General, and some Officers of arbitrary Principles, are so prejudicial to us, where they are, as if the one was in the House of Lords. and the rest in the House of Commons. This the French King thinks of his Calvinists, as much as we do of our Papists; for the first are by their Principles as great Enemies to a despotick Prince, as the others are to any limited Government.

An. The French Refugees differ very much in their Opinions about their King, ever since I have learn'd that Language: You know I have been acquainted with several; there's Madame L'Orgueilleuse praises him to the Skies, she won't hear the least Word spoke against him; but Mademoiselle la Pigote, in talking of him, discovers so much Spleen, she can't forbear calling him Names: I have laugh'd heartily to hear her, and Monsieur L'Opiniatre strive to out-do one another in Invectives against him; as if they talk'd of a Newgate-Bird, or a Fellow that had been pilloried, and not of a Prince.

Lu. The first is foolish; for if they thought him just and good, as well as great and political, what did they come away for? But to do the other, is a very great Fault; it is unmannerly in any Body to speak disrespectfully of Princes.

An. Begging your Pardon, Aunt, if I am not mistaken, I have heard you call him Tyrant, and other Names.

Lu. I might speak a Word that express'd a Resentment, but you never heard me say any Thing that shew'd Contempt. But if this be a Crime in us, it is unpardonable in those that were born under his Government. Good People look

look upon their native Country, as their Mother, and the Government as their Father. If your Father should even disinherit you, you might be sorry, and think he has not done well by you ; but you must never speak ill of him, and always remember, that whatever he did, still he was your Father.

An. But what must a Child do, when he sees his Father and Mother a quarrelling ?

Lu. Never irritate the Wrath of the one, or inflame the Anger of the other ; do 'em both all the good Offices you are capable of, in order to appease 'em ; but never serve the one against the other, tho' they should command you : When their Passion is over, and they are Friends again, depend upon it, they'll both thank you for your Disobedience, but whatever may happen in a Family, nothing can be a sufficient Provocation for a Child to fly in the Face of the Mother that brought him forth. Tho I was a Man, I could never with, much less fight against my Country.

An. But I have other Things to ask you, concerning the French Protestants.

Lu. And I have abundance more to tell you ; but I see it is turn'd of five, and high Time to drink Tea ; I begin to be a-dry too.

An. Then Grace, it seems, knows your Mind ; for there she's coming with the Water.

Lu. Bid her carry the Things into the Garden ; the Sun is gone off the Summer-house, and we'll go thither.

An. I'll wait on you, Aunt.

Lu. Stay ; whither are you running ?

An. I'll only step in the Parlour for my Bonnet.

Lu. I saw it in your Hand when you came to Dinner. Here it is.

THE EIGHTH
DIALOGUE

BETWEEN

Lucinda and Antonia.

Lucinda, WHAT is that Spot upon your Arm, Niece?

An. That's a Mark of your beloved Captain, that brought you the Mountain Malaga: I believe, I have had it above a Fortnight. There is not such a wild Bear again in England, as that nasty Terpawlin; he rumples my Head-Cloaths, kisses and slabbers me over every Moment: I hate him mortally. He'n ver was here to see you, but he teaz'd me to Death; he hurts my Arms, squeezes my Hands, pushes me from him, then hawls me to him again; and plays with me as if I was a Puppy that wanted warming.

Lu. A rough, harmless Soul!

An. Harmless, do you call him? I am sure, he is very impudent. Last Time he was here, he put his Hand down my Bosom, as low as he could thrust it; and he is so strong, I can as well remove the House, as hinder him. I have been amaz'd sometimes, you never spoke to him; nay, when he has tumbl'd and towz'd me me before your Face, I have seen you smile at it, as if you had been very well pleas'd. I can't imagine you should not apprehend a Man that is really rude, when I see you so very watchful over every civil Gentleman that com's near me; tho' no Body ever offers to touch me, but that unpolish'd Sea-monster.

Lu. I know it is a Way he has of shewing his Gallantry ; but I don't fear him.

An. But I do fear him ; for what you call his Gallantry, is down-right Incivility.

Lu. Look, look, Niece ; that comes very pat. Don't you see, there in the Meadow ? Pray mind ; look.

An. I don't know what you mean, nor what you laugh at ; I see nothing to mind.

Lu. Don't you see a Horse stand still ?

An. Yes, and a Fellow going up to it: Is there any Rariety in that ?

Lu. Mind how he holds the Bridle upon his Back, and how softly he creeps to him. Open the Sash : Hark, he is a whistling to him ; now he takes hold of him : There he claps the Bit into his Mouth. Poor Horse ! he is taken indeed.

An. And pray, Aunt, what is all this ?

Lu. This is the Horse that scamper'd about so, when we came first out of Doors.

An. I know it is the same that the Boys fear'd with their Hats.

Lu. And can you not perceive that this is an Emblem of what you spoke of ? There is nothing more dangerous, than to trust young Women with what you call civil Gentlemen for, by not offering any Thing to 'em, they disperse their Fear, and make 'em tame. If once they they can perswade 'em to listen calmly to their wheedling Cant, the Bridle is soon thrown over their Heads : And this is the Reason, why you have always seen me so distrustful of their Civility, and so little concern'd at the Captain's Rudeness, because he is just like the Boys that threw their Hats at the Horse; he may frighten you, but he'll never trick you into Slavery. A Man that is always kissing and hawling of a Woman, puts her upon her Guard himself, and young Women hate nothing more, than Men that are troublesome in teasing and laying hold of 'em; but especially, if they tumble their Cloaths, or any ways disoblige their Dress. But don't be angry, Niece, he shall be troublesome no more : I confess, seeing his Humour, I have made use of him, as a Tool to rouse you, because I know, that when Maids are so serv'd by Men they don't fancy, it not only renders those that plague 'em, odious to 'em, but likewise makes 'em shy of others, to whom they would else be indifferent.

An. I find, Aunt, you leave no Stone unturn'd; but I remember we were talking of the French Protestants, before we came into the Garden; and your Answer seem'd to me plausible enough, as to them that have taken up Arms against their Prince. But leaving them, tell me, if you don't think that so many thousands of Handicrafts-Men, that have settl'd Trades, and brought over whole Manufacturies to us, and other Protestant Countries, have done him a great Prejudice ?

Lu. It is beyond Dispute, that the Loss of such considerable Numbers, has weaken'd his Kingdom; but the Question is, whether the same same Numbers might not have been more obnoxious to him, if they had staid there? I have observ'd, that when our Armies are like to come near Dauphine and Provence, or any other Parts where there is a great many new Converts, we always rejoyce at it, and seem not to question but that as soon as we can protect 'em, they will join us; if our Hopes be not vain, 'tis well for the King of France, that there's no more of 'em.

An. But what you speak of, Aunt, is only since they have been so ill us'd; before they were the best of Subjects; they always supported him against his Enemies; nay, I have heard 'em say, 'twas they that set the Crown upon his Head.

Lu. They might have been very beneficial to him for one while, and quiet for many Years, and yet the French King fore-see something in 'em more than any Body else. He has punish'd 'em for Faults before they were committed. If you ask me, whether the Usage which they had from him, was not tyrannical, and, if you will ungrateful, I'll answer you, Yes: But if you would enquire, whether in the carrying on his Design upon Europe, it was his true Interest or not, to use 'em so, I don't believe that any one in all the Universe is so well qualify'd, and able to inform you, as Le is the XIVth himself. It is very needless to touch upon any Thing that ever has been said for or against his destroying the Protestants; let us only reflect, first, upon the Tranquility of all the Princes of Europe, at the Treaty of Nimwegen; secondly, upon the Assurance he had of his own Power, when he thought himself a Match for for so many but half a Score Years after : Then let us examine what we have seen hitherto ; and from their so little apprehending any Danger, and the French King's Confidence, I think we may safely conclude, that he was better acquainted with the real State of Europe, and knew more of his Strength, and theirs too, than all together of 'em understood, either of his, or their own. This, in my Opinion, is an undeniable Argument of his having so thoroughly and successfully examin'd his Kingdom ; that it would be a Folly to think, that any other Politician should exceed him in the Knowledge of every Thing that might increase its Greatness, or hinder its Growth. Was there ever a French Hugonot, Princes of the Blood not excepted, that had that Intelligence, or that constantly receiv'd so true an Account of what was said or done in every Part of France ? Or is it reasonable to believe, that the French King should have been out in knowing of his own Kingdom, when we see he is so expert in others, and has shewn himself so great a Master in Politicks ?

An. But, Aunt, you use that as an Argument, which you are still to prove.

Lu. Prove ! what ? That he has shewn himself a great Master in Politicks ? Can any Body doubt of it ? Do but mind, how deep he has work'd under Ground, to undermine that noble Structure, the House of Austria, that was built upon such solid a Foundation, and but an Age ago, so far over-topt that of Bourbon ! how cunningly he has sav'd himself in the spoiling of it ; sometimes setting it on Fire, by blowing the Coal of civil War, and inland

Combustions

Combustions; and at other Times battering it, by playing the whole Artillery of the Ottoman Empire against it. Let any one consider what Pranks he has play'd with England and Holland, helping the one against the other as he saw it most requisite, in order to weaken both; how shamefully he has bubbled, and perwaded them out of their Interest, by setting 'em together by the Ears! If we observe how dexterously he has manag'd all the Courts of Europe, by artfully covering his Game to hide his Power, never making use of more than was requisite, to tire his Enemies; how all his Wars, but these two last, were to him only Breathings; by which, to exercise himself, he weary'd others; and he never exerted half his Strength, before his Designs were come to Maturity, we shall find, that he has been no ordinary Politician. But what he has done in Spain, seems to exceed all human Art: He has made a Spaniard agree with a Frenchman; in an Instant rais'd that drooping heavy Monarchy, that for so many Years had been sinking under its own Weight. In the last War, it was little better than a dead Lump, and a Purden to the Confederacy, yet he has quicken'd that slow Nation, even against their own Interest, and in a little Time, by skillful Management, made 'em useful to his own Purpose, in spite of stupendous Losses, and all the vast Obstacles the greatest Powers of Europe have been able to throw in his Way. The French King, by shewing them their own Power, has wheedl'd 'em into Slavery; his airy Fiddlers have plaid 'em out of their obstinate, melancholy Humor; his gay Dancing Masters have broke 'em of their

Stiffness

Stiffness, and made 'em supple; they have so chang'd their Postures, and alter'd their Steps, that now you may see, what the World always thought impossible, a grave Spaniard to French Musick dance the Canaries: He has join'd Fire and Water, and blended them into profitable Mixture: These are Miracles that no other Politician was ever able to perform. The Germans know how to conquer, are crafty in their Designs, and understand the laying on the Yoke, as well as others; but they have not the French Knack of tying it on, to make it sit easy; it presently galls those that wear it, they always complain. Lewis the XIVth cuts Throats with a Feather, and draws Teeth without Pain. Bavaria is ruin'd, his Brother undone; and yet they are in Love with their Chains, and seem to laugh at their own Destruction. Mind what Loads he has laid on his People, and how merrily they have carry'd 'em along hitherto; nay, even now, when their Backs are broke, and they actually drop down under the Burden, you may still hear 'em, as if he had bewitch'd 'em, sing his Praises in the midst of their Afflictions. Some Nations are in Politicks, what Galenists are in Physick; they fill their Patients with large Potions, turn their Stomacks with nauseous Drenches, and ply 'em with bigger Bolusses than they are able to swallow; and all to little Purpose, but to enrich their favourite Apothecaries; whilst the French King is a refin'd Chymist, who with, small Pill and a few Drops, that are hardly felt in going down, and yet of a wonderful Operation in the Body, cures the most dangerous, as well as the most inveterate Distempers. What strange Alterations has he made in all the Courts of Europe, with only two Medicines, his Aurum potabile, and his Tincture of Opium!

An. I don't understand you, Aunt.

Lu. I mean Bribery and lulling asleep.

An. If what you say, be true, it is strange that a great many People should think him so often mistaken!

Lu. The surest Way of judging of Politicks, is, as I do of my Orchard. My Gardener understands the Weather very well, fore-tells me what Winds will be blasting, or bring the black Fly, which will produce Worms, which Caterpillars: Sometimes he scratches his Head and cries, no Fruit at all, our Orchard won't hit this Year: Three or four Days after, perhaps he changes his Note, and believes we shall have a pretty Sprinkling, for all that. At other Years I have heard him say, If the Spring keeps thus backward, we shall have a World a Fruit; and all the while the Trees are in Blossom, he is full of his Predictions, in which he often guesses wrong; and I that know very little of all those Things, am never deceiv'd.

An. That's a Riddle to me.

Lu. I never say or think any Thing of it, before the Fruit is ripe; but when they gather it, I have it measur'd, and then I can tell you what there is, to half a Peck.

An. That is a very sure Method, I confess.

Lu. Examin into the Power of France, when Lewis the XIVth came to the Throne, what it was in regard of the other Powers of Europe, that were either equal or superior to it; afterwards see what it is now, in Proportion of those

those same Powers, and then judge of his Politicks.

An. But I would have you tell me, Annt, since the Kingdom of France is in that wretched Condition, and is like to be worse and worse every Day, what his Subjects are the better for his Wisdom, and in what their Happiness consists?

Lu. I never told you, that the King was wise; for no Body can be so, but what is good, and that he never was, nor did I ever say his Subjects were happy, because I could never think that Slaves were so. But in order to answer you to what you seem to lay the greatest Stress upon, the miserable Poverty of the lowest Rank of People in France, I must tell you, that the Subordinations of the Degrees of People, differ in every Nation, according to the Degrees of Liberty they enjoy. As for Example; In France there is a vast Distance between the Nobility and the Gentry; in Holland there is none at all, not so much as in the Language; with us, that are a Mixture of Monarchy and Commonwealth together, tho' there is a great Difference, the Top of the Gentry converse with the Nobility; a Gentleman here, speaks to a Peer with his Hat on, goes to the Tavern, pays his Club; but in France there is no such Thing. What I say of the Nobility and Gentry, you must understand of all the several Degrees of People, from the Sovereign to the Beggar.

An. If that be true, then in Holland there is no Difference between the Sovereign and the Beggar.

Lu. I'll tell you how there is not; the common People in Holland, tho' they stand in great Awe of their Magistrates, hardly ever shew 'em any Respect, unless they are known by 'em, but in Execution of their Offices, when they are before 'em, and can't help it. The Notion they have of Liberty, makes 'em so proud, that the ordinary Man thinks himself as good as the best in the Land; and knowing that all are subject to the same Laws, naturally scorns to pay any Homage to Men that by their Birth have no Prerogative over him.

An. And don't this make 'em very sawcy?

Lu. Intollerably. France is the Reverse of Holland, and the People of the lowest Rank, are as fawning Slaves of the first, as they are unmannerly Brutes of the latter. We are between both, and our Mobility, though they are not so civil, yet they are less rude than the other. A Porter that carries a Burden here, cries, Have a Care; if he sees a Gentleman, perhaps he'll say, With your Leave, Sir: But in Holland, a Fellow very often, without giving the Warning, will trundle a Wheel-barrow against your Legs, and afterwards scold at you for not standing out of the Way. In France, the Country People are very obliging, as well as submits to the Gentry; they'll often pull off their Hats a good while before you come to 'em, and stand out of your Way in a great deal of Humility, 'till you are past by: But the Dutch Boors, valuing themselves upon what they save by being penurious, have a Hatred and Aversion against every Thing that seems more civiliz'd than themselves.

An. What is all this to our Purpose?

Lu. More than you imagine. Where the Poor set such a small Value upon themselves, and and esteem the better Sort far above their own Rank, it must follow, that they will work much cheaper, and be contented to live much meaner than where they are to haughty.

An. I have often heard, that the ordinary People live no where better, than here; and yet you say, that our Mob is not quite so insolent as that of the Dutch; then how can the living well of the Poor be a Consequence of their Haughtiness?

Lu. If you speak of near London, or the great Towns, and plentiful Counties of England, you are in the Right; or else, in some Parts of Great Britain, the Poor live very indifferently; and yet better than in several Parts of France, that are more plentiful. When, in judging of the Degrees of People, you would compare two Countries together, you should always examine what Proportion the one bears to the other. The Dutch, perhaps, have more Money than we, but they have no Land, nor Plenty in Comparison to us; and if they were less industrious and saving, they could not make such a Figure in the World, as they do. But how numerous and powerful soever they appear, we are a greater and richer Nation, by abundance, than they.

An. Then you would say, we ought not to compare the Dutch Poor to ours, unless there was the same Plenty in Holland, that is here.

Lu. I would so; and then their ordinary People would far over-top ours, because that Distance between the Degrees of People, which I spoke of before, is every way less in Commonwealths, than it is in Kingdoms, and yet not so great in limited Monarchies, as it is in those that are arbitrary.

An. But how could you prove, that the Poor in Holland, if they had our Plenty, for the Reason you alledge, would live better than our Poor do here? I believe that's only a Supposition.

Lu. But I'll shew you that it is more than probable; the lowest Rank of People here, only fares better as to their Diet, but the same Sort of People in Holland, even as they are now, out-do ours in every Thing else; they are better stock'd in Cloaths, though they are more saving of 'em, and always more tight and neat; never so ragged nor so greasy as most of our ordinary People are in their daily Dress; they have more Furniture and Utensils about them, and Things look more decent and becoming in their Houses or Lodgings, though they are never so low or so little. Most of 'em are seldom so poor, but they have a small Hoard of Money, or Money's Worth, to go to in Time of Need; besides, they could eat and drink better, if they would be as little provident as they are here. The Poor in Holland are very well paid for their Labour, and in Proportion of the Gains and Sallaries of the better Sort, far out-strip our Poor here. A Counsellor's Fee is three Shillings, a Physician can hardly demand one; and yet a Porter earns his two Pence, and his six Pence at Amsterdam, as soon as they do at London.

An. You have hitherto been very obscure, Aunt, to my thinking; but now I begin to understand what you drive at.

Lu. Let me hear you.

An. You are of Opinion, that where Nations are equal in Riches and Plenty, the lowest Rank of People will not be so poor in a Commonwealth, as in a Kingdom; and that they must still be more superlatively mean in an absolute, than in a limited Monarchy.

Lu. That is my Meaning indeed; and by that you'll find how silly People are, that from the wretched Condition of the lowest Part of the People of France, conclude the Poverty of the whole; they don't consider, that if the under Part of a Nation, where the Power is lodg'd in one, be so abjectly mean, the upper Part again is of a more towering Grandeur. When France was in its most flourishing Condition, the Country People were always poor: It had been well for Europe, if the Wealth of France had been more equally divided among all the Subjects, and the Country People had liv'd as well as our Farmers and Yeomen do here.

An. Why, Aunt?

Lu. Because then the French King could never have rais'd such Swarms of Soldiers, to keep so many Armies on Foot; nor so soon found sufficient Recruits after such great Defeats and Losses as he has sustain'd.

An. But I thought Money was the Sinew of War.

Lu. It is so; and he has had a prodigious Plenty of that too. But when our late King, of glorious Memory, made that powerful Alliance against him, his Money could never have found him Men enough Abroad to hold out, and supply so many destructive Campaigns, and would have truckl'd to us long ago, if it had not been for the vast Numbers he had at Home. The Kingdom is very large, the opulent Cities very many, and the Towns of Note very numerous; their haughty Monarch, by being arbitrary, rather ador'd, than honour'd; the Pomp in which he is serv'd, is answerable to his Pride. The Princes of the Blood likewise keep magnificent Courts: Abundance of the Nobility, the Clergy, as well as the Laity, have princely Revenues, and live up to the Height of 'em; throughout the Kingdom, there are a great many over-grown rich People, that live in Splendor and Luxury; the Gentry of all the Provinces, in the Country, as well as the City, follow the Extravagancy of the Court to the utmost of their Abilities. What Multitudes of Tradesmen and Artificers must this not employ in every Corner? And the whole being inspir'd with the same Gayety and Fickleness in their Fashions, is it possible but this must, without considering any foreign Trade, occasion an incredible Circulation of Money among themselves?

An. You talk of Gayety and Luxury, most of the French, that I know, are very miserly.

Lu. You must never judge of People out of their own Country; besides the Alteration it often makes in their Circumstances, they seldom have the same Things they were us'd to; and consequently are forc'd to change their whole manner of Living. The Dutch are, without doubt, a cleanly People; but you would not think so, if you was to examine them at St. Catharine's. There may be a great many Misers in France, but so there are Spend-thrifts in in Holland; but Avarice is no more the Country Vice or the one, than Lavishness is of the other; and the first is as much pointed at and ridicul'd in a plentiful Country, where there is an absolute Monarchy, as the latter is discountenanc'd in a Commonwealth, where they have little of their own Growth.

An. Then how must we judge of our selves?

Lu. By the same Rule. In our Government we have a Mixture of a Kingdom and a Republick; we have a larger, if not a more fruitful Country, and a greater Product of our own, than the Dutch; and yet we want Oil, Wine, and several other Things, which the French abound in; and therefore the Consequence is, that for the Generality we are not so provident as the one, and less extravagant than the other.

An. Then, by what I can hear, the Dutch are covetous and careful; we free and unthinking; and the French profuse and mad.

Lu. The Expressions are a little harsh, but if you soften 'em a little, it is thereabouts.

An. But why should People, under an arbitrary Government, be more lavish of their Money, than any other?

Lu. Perhaps for the very Reason that profess'd Gamesters are generally the same, because they know the Uncertainty of keeping it; or else from that which always has had so great an Influence upon the Actions of the People, the Example of the Sovereign; and the French for a great many Years, have had a rare Pattern. Lewis the XIVth has led his Money a weary Life, and his Pistoles have travell'd thro' all the Courts of Europe.

An.

An. I confess, that I have heard much of the French Pistols.

Lu. Yes, Niece, they have not stop't at Ministers of State, but brib'd even Monarchs themselves, to act against their Interest, and whole Nations have groan'd under the Weight of his irresistib'le Gold. All this was spent out of his own Country; but let us see whether he has been more frugal at Home, and consider the innumerable Rewards he has given to his own Subjects; Monsieur Colbert left his Family 60 Millions of Livres; to Monsieur de Louvois he gave the whole Revenue of the general Post-Office of France, which yearly brought in several hundred thousand Pounds Sterling.

An. Now I suppose you'll come to his improving of all Arts and Sciences, the Beauty of the Language, and the Excellency of their Poetry; but I must beg your Pardon, I can't endure to hear any more in Praise of the French, unless I was more able to answer you. I am very well satisfy'd, that I have heard great Judges say, that our Language is as copious, our Phrase more compendious than theirs, and that the best of our English Poets exceed the best of the French, both in Wit, and Strength of Expression.

Lu. A true-born English-Woman indeed; I love your Company, Antonia, and I would not have said half so much, if I had thought the Subject displeas'd you: I shall only tell you an Observation I have made, and then I have done. The Generality of all Nations think their own Language the best; but in what Part of the Nation do you think the common People, and even the little Children, speak best?

An. I should think near the Court.

Lu. 'Tis true, and consequently the nicest Judges of Language, are at the Courts. This being granted, if all the Courts of Europe should speak English, would you not think that a very good Argument of its being the best Language ?

An. There might be other Reasons.

Lu. I am sure they would offend you more, and so no more of that. As to the next, it is very difficult to judge of Poetry in two Languages, for two Reasons; the first is, That there is not one in ten thousand that ever attains to that Perfection in another Language, as to understand the Beauties of it, as well as he does those of his own. The second is, Because the Rules of Poetry in two Countries, according to the several Humours of Nations, are sometimes as different as the Languages themselves; so that the Faults of the one, are often Beauties in the other; and it is next to an Impossibility, that People should like, even to Fondness, what they have been us'd to, and at the same Time be as much pleas'd with what runs quite contrary to it. Take an English-Man, that understands French enough to translate from it, with now and then the Help of a Dictionary; suppose him to meet with a celebrated Poem in that Language, being a Stranger to the Elegancy, as well as the Gravity and Easiness of the Diction, all his Aim is, to know what he calls the intrinsic Value of it, the Meaning: So, having roughly hammer'd out the Sense, he likes it extraordinary well; but as he ruminates upon it, some witty Flights jumping into his Head upon the Occasion, he blames the French-

French-Man for not having made the best of so fine a Thought, without considering, that, according to the different Rules, what may be very apropos in English, would have been as unseasonable in the French: Inspir'd by Wit, the Darling of his Country, he resolves upon an Imitation, and happily renders the Substance of every Thought into good English Verse.

An. I thought that was call'd Translating.

Lu. It ought to be so; but when People have a mind to take all the Benefit of a Translation, without being ty'd to its Striçtness, they are pleas'd to call it Imitation, tho' in Reality, it is neither. This Verse, we'll suppose to be extraordinary well writ, but yet inferior to the Original. If both these Poems are shewn to an English Critick, of the same Abilities, as to the French, with the former, first, he takes the French, and as soon as he has made himself Master of what it means, he is likewise highly pleas'd with the Fancy: But coming to the English, if the Thought gave a Pleasure to his Mind, when it was yet wrapt up in Ornaments, which were Clouds to him, and he but dimly saw it, it is natural to think, that when it is not only set in full View, but likewise adorn'd with Beauties he is fond of, it will more affect and strike him to the Quick; and let him study to be as impartial as is possible, the Up-shot must be this; the Thought (says he) is good, and owing to the French; but it is beyond Dispute, that the English has far out-done the Original. I do not say, neither do I think, that our Poetry is inferior to the French: What I would have you know, is, that though Persons are never so well qualify'd, there there is no comparing of 'em together, because the Beauties are so different.

Antonia

An. I find you think it foolish for us to judge of their Poetry ; but why are they less to blame for despising ours?

Lu. I don't think they are ; but rather more, because few of their Criticks of Note, ever troubled their Heads half so much with our Language, as a great many of ours, that understood French, have study'd theirs: But one Thing they are to be commended for, that as they find fault with our Poetry, they never steal from it ; but one of our best Poets always spoke very much against the French, and yet took most of his Plots and Characters from them: And once, having borrow'd from a certain Tragedy of theirs, all what belongs to Judgment, or Invention, he made a very good English Play: It was acted with Applause, the Copy sold at a high Rate ; and yet, in the Preface, his Wit got so much the upper-hand of his good Nature, that he could not forbear railing at the Foreigner, to whom he ow'd his Success. I had no Design to speak of Poetry at all, but that you mention'd it.

An. What you said of that, I can bear well enough, as long as you believe ours equal to theirs ; but I cannot abide to hear my own Country revil'd, of which I feel the Love so warm about me.

Lu. What Weakness you shew, I'll tell you hereafter, but don't you see how little Politics agree with young Ladies, Antonia?

An. I must own, that much of 'em would soon tire me, and something that is more delightful, lightful, and requires less Attention, suit my Humour better.

Lu. What say you to a diverting Story ?

An. As much of that as you please.

Lu. A Noble-man, of ancient Family, in a flourishing Kingdom, was left Heir to an immense Estate, both in Land and Money. His natural Parts, and the Improvements of Education, had render'd him, before he was come to Age, a Man of polite Learning, and admirable Sense : As soon as he was twenty one, he was resolv'd to shew the World, by living up to the Grandeur of his Wealth, that he was worthy of such princely Revenues. Upon the Top of a small Hill, in a Gravel Ground, within two Miles of a fine River, on the North-side of it, he built a magnificent Palace, about fifteen Miles from a populous City. The main Building was Stone, with a noble Frontispiece, and the two Wings of Brick. An exact Regularity was observ'd without, and nothing but Conveniency within. In the great Hall, two large Chimnies and a Stair-Case were of Marble, and the Pavement of the same. The Wainscot was plain and strong, with sturdy broad Benches round it, and the huge Grates, as well as the Backs of the Chimnies, were only painted black. It would take up a twelve Month to describe every Room in the House ; I shall only tell you, that the chief Ornament of the lower Rooms, was History-painting in vast Pannels, fix'd to the Walls. and some extraordinary Pieces of Tapestry. The Bed-Chambers were richly hung, and several of them had Silver Hearths, Sconces, and Tables. As he was a great Lover of Painting, he had a fine Collection diverting story (as opposed to a serious one)

Collection of Italian, and other Originals ; the smallest were distributed in several Closets, and the largest made a glorious Shew upon the Stair-Cases. Of Looking-glasses, Cabinet-work, Carving, and Gilding, there was a prodigious Quantity. But though the Furniture was of an inestimable Value, yet the judicious Fancy of the Master, so conspicuous thro' the whole, was more surprising than all the rest. In the Dressing-Room of his own Apartment, was a Door that open'd into a Gallery, at the End of which was his Library : It was a large, square, lofty Room ; round it, touching the Cieling, were fifty fine Pieces of Limning in black Ebony Frames ; they were so many Heads of Men, that had been famous for Learning ; where they ended, the Books began, and reach'd to the Bottom ; he had none but what were valuable, the best Editions of every Thing, and no Work uncompleat. His Library-keeper was a well-bred Man, of indifferent Learning, that understood the Prices and Title-Pages of Books, better than their Insides, and look'd more like a brisk Bookseller, than a Pedant : He had a great many Gentlemen that waited on him ; and from the highest to the lowest, all his Servants were so well chosen, that you might almost see in their Faces, what Places they belong'd to.

An. That's strange indeed, unless it was writ upon their Foreheads.

Lu. You won't allow of a Figure, I see ; but to be more plain, I'll describe some of them to you : His Steward was a grave and affable Man, that without hurrying himself or others, had been us'd to a Multiplicity of Business. His Secretary Secretary was, in Reality, a Man of Sense and Solidity, and in Appearance, a Rattle. His Gentleman of the Horse, was slender, and well shap'd, airy in his Mien, and proud in his Dress.

An. But why don't you say what Parts he had; as well as you did of the others?

Lu. Because 'twas no great Matter. As to his meaner Servants, his Foot-men were neat, brisk, and clever. His Coach-men were always jolly-lock'd Fellows, that fill'd the Fox, and hated Drinking. His Grooms were all Farriers and understood Horses better than Men. His Park-keepers were sturdy and ill-natur'd; but his Cooks were cleanly and tractable; and on with the rest. The Wages he gave 'em, were extraordinary, but the least Fault twice committed, turn'd them off.

An. I should be glad to hear some more of their Characters.

Lu. It would be too tedious to tell them you all; I only nam'd a few to let you know how nice he was in his Choice. But of all what I had about him, I lik'd nothing so well, as his keeping a dozen of Gentlemen, all learned, witty, and facetious Men, that excell'd every one in something or other. Amongst them, he had Lawyers, Physicians, Poets, Historians, Naturalists, Mathematicians, great Travellers, and the whole made a compleat Body of Learning.

An. What was their Business?

Lu. To do what they pleas'd once a Week and the next to be within Call: All the rest of his Domesticks stood at a great Distance from him, only these he treated as his Companions.

they were all single Men, had every one a Footman, and a couple of Horses kept them, with a Salary of 300*l.* a Year, had a fine Apartment, and a splendid Provision for all the Necessaries of Life. The six, that were not in waiting, had always two Coaches to attend them, and made a Journey, at least once a Week, to the great City: when they came there, they dispers'd themselves, and every one went about what Business he fancy'd most; not forgetting the Booksellers-Shops, Coffee-Houses, and other Places of publick Resort, where Gentlemen might be inform'd of what was worth knowing. One, perhaps, taking Delight in down-right Learning, minded nothing but History, and Antiquity. A second being more gay, enquir'd after Plays and Opera's, and only regarded Musick, or Poetry. A third was always employ'd in Chymistry, or Botany. Some studying Nature it self, were for experimental Philosophy: Whilst others had no mind to try any Thing but Pleasure, and belong'd to several Clubs of jovial Gentlemen that made Mirth their only Business. In these, they chiefly discours'd of delightful Novels, merry Stories, and well invented Tales. Some excell'd in Repartee, and witty Sayings. Others were eminent for Epigrams, and odd Inscriptions. And several of 'em were not only famous for pleasant Remarks upon the Accidents of human Life, but likewise facetiously good-humour'd in entertaining their Friends with the diverting Passages they remember'd. The Gentlemen, that were of the Lords Retinue, commonly set out early in the Morning, and came back toward the Evening of the next Day. When they were at Home, they spent their Time all the Fore-noon in the several Studies to which their Inclinations led them, and the rest of the Day, partly in profitable Contabulations among one another, partly in receiving and discoursing with Strangers, and those that came to see them; every one, the Merry, as well as the more Serious, setting constantly down whatever they met with in their Way worth Observation; and the witty Answer of a Child, or the innocent Saying of a Plowman, if there was but something extraordinary in them, were writ down as eagerly by some, and by others the principal State-Maxims of any Emperor's Reign. They had what Wine they pleas'd, and two Tables allow'd them with great Varieties, and several Officers to serve them; to which, as well as the great Library, all Gentlemen had Access. Nothing was made more of, than Strangers of Parts: As soon as they were found to be such, they were desired to stay, and treated most deliciously. If any that excell'd in something, happen'd (beside the other Endowments) to be of an agreeable Temper, and refin'd Education, his Lordship was acquainted with it presently. No Body whose Mind was well-dress'd, was less welcome for the Meaness of his Habit; and a new Set of Cloaths, with half a Score Guineas, was the least Present, that, in a free and obliging Manner, was offer'd to those that stood in need of it.

An. Then I suppose this Lord had abundance of such Customers.

Lu. Not many; for this was only done to a deserving People; as for those that because they wore a black Gown, and understood a little of nary Latin, call'd themselves Scholars, and were poor both Ways, they were very little regarded, made seldom more than two Meals there, and if they begg'd it, had half a Crown given them at their Departure. About six at Night, their Maccenas was us'd to send for three or four of his Gentlemen, whom he chose according to the Humour he was in, and so for four or five Hours was diverted with nothing but the Flower and Quintessence of Learning and Conversation. By his Evening-Recreation, judge of the rest, for all his Diversions were answerable one to the other. And don't you think now, Niece, that this Noble-man had a tolerable good Relish?

An. I think so well of him, that I wish you could help me to such a Husband.

Lu. Take Care you don't repent. Thus he liv'd for twenty Years, courteous and good-humour'd, charitable to the Poor, generous to Merit, and an excellent Pay-master to all he employ'd. Plenty reign'd in his Family, yet none, though much less was better order'd, and every Servant growing rich in his Station, by his Purse, could shew the Munificence of his Master. You'll wonder perhaps, when I tell you that the Bottom of all this was Pride!

An. Yet it was commendable, as long as so many receiv'd the Benefit of it!

Lu. When he thought he had sufficiently convinc'd the World of the Excellency of his Taste, he grew weary of all this Regularity, and suddenly bending his Pleasures another Way, and giving himself over to Women and Gaming, became vicious with the same Application he had always shewn in whatever he took in Hand.

Not a man's reason
(negative)

In 5 Years Time, all his Estate was mortgag'd, his Palace out of Repair ; and when he began to want Money, first he employ'd one of his Retinue, of whom he had already borrow'd what he had, upon a Promise of a very high Interest, to wheedle all the rest out of the Money they had laid up in his Service ; then went his Plate, and the fine Collections of Books and Pictures were parted with, without any Regret, 'till nothing being able to maintain his Course of Life, himself was deeply in Debt, his Kitchen without Fire, and his trusty Servants ready to starve. By what I have said, it is manifest, that the Reason this Great Man had, for the best of his Actions, was not because they were good, but because they contributed to his Pleasure ; he made his Servants rich, because it consisted with his Greatness, and had never thought of their Happiness, but as it was serviceable to his Pride.

An. I like the first Part of the Story very well ; but the Turn of it seems to be very malicious : If there ever was such a one, he must be abominated ; but I can hardly think a Man of that exquisite Sense could ever be guilty of the latter Part.

Lu. But suppose there was such a one, I would abominate him as much as you ; but in railing at him, would you say he was an ignorant Blockhead, and a sorry Fellow, that understood nothing of the World, and never had known what it was to keep a good House ?

An. No ; for what Vice soever he was guilty of, there was no doubt but he that had given such Demonstrations of his Skill and Fancy, and for so many Years us'd such uncommon Methods thods of improving himself, must be a Man of prodigious Parts.

Lu. I thank you, Antonia. Take this Noble-man to be the King of France, and what I told you of the Servants of the one, apply to the Subjects of the other.

An. Then they are miserable, and little beholden to their Sovereign.

Lu. I am of your Opinion, but what would you say of their King?

An. Good and Evil both; but I could not speak of the first with a great Affection; and indeed I could allow the French King all the Skill and Cunning you have set him off with, if I could but think that, for all that, you hated him as much as I would do this Noble-man with all his good Qualities.

Lu. Doubt not but that I do, and much more; but the King of France can never be made lower by being rail'd at. I wish all that were able, were as willing as I, and Taxes should be continu'd or doubl'd, if it was requisite, one six Years longer, to humble his insolent Haughtiness. Can any one love Liberty, and not abhor that harden'd Monster of Ambition? To whom the greatest Losses and Calamities of his Friends, are not unwelcome, if they can but advance his Glory. That arbitrary Fiend, that knowing himself to be the Cause of War and Famine, beholds the Miseries of his own People with less Concern than you can see a Play; the Bane of Mankind, that can draw whole Schemes of the Destruction and Devastation of flourishing Cities and plentiful Countries, with the same Tranquility as I can play a Game at Chess; and if it but contributes to his gigantick Aim, esteeming the Lives of a hundred thousand of the most faithful of his Subjects, no more than I value the losing of a single Pawn, if it forwards my Design upon your Game.

An. Now, Aunt, you have gain'd my Heart intirely; and I'll own, that the King of France is the greatest King that ever reign'd, to all that will lend a Hand to pull him down. But I believe Supper is ready, for there I see Tom coming to call us.

Lu. I am very well pleas'd I have convinc'd you at last, without offending you. Come let us go.

An. Yes, Aunt; I wait on you.

THE NINTH
DIALOGUE

BETWEEN

Lucinda and Antonia.

Antonia, IT is impossible, Aunt, a Woman that is really vertuous, and remains so, should lose her Honour, unless she be ravish'd; and then 'tis a Question, whether she loses it or not.

Lucinda, There is no Doubt, but a Woman that is murder'd, loses her Life as much as she that dies of a Fever. But that is not the Thing I am speaking of: What I say, is, that no Woman, tho' of the most exemplary Vertue, is able to withstand the Treachery of some Men; if once she abandons that Fear, which is so necessary for her Protection, and thinking herself secure, ceases to be upon her Guard. Oh! Antonia, I could give you such a sad Instance of one, that only for Want of apprehending the Danger, without being ravish'd, was robb'd of her Honour; one whose Conduct your self shall not be able to blame, even the Moment she lost it, whose Vertue had been often try'd, and could never be said to have left her.

An. That's strange indeed ; and if you please to tell me her History, I shall hearken with great Attention.

Lu. I will ; but take Care not to interrupt me so often as you us'd to do, or else I can't finish it before Supper.

An. I won't indeed, Aunt.

Lu. About the Middle of August, after the Diversion of Stag-hunting, the Duke of B——, with five or six of his Attendance, was riding a Foot-pace towards a Gentleman's Seat, whom he had promis'd the Honour of his Company at Dinner. Being advanc'd within a Musket-Shot of the House, which was pleasantly situated on a rising Ground, about three Miles from Guildford in Surrey, he saw through a By-Lane, a Horse coming full Speed, and upon it a very young Gentlewoman, that not being able to govern it, did what she could to keep her Seat. The Duke and those that were with him, posted themselves at the Entrance of the Lane, where the Horse being stopt in his Career, flew aside, leapt the Hedge, and left his Rider behind him. As soon as she was come to the Ground, two of the Gentlemen made what Haste they could to her Assistance ; but she was too nimble for them, and got upon her Feet before they could come to her. When she was yet on Horseback, the Fright she was in, had made her look as pale as Death ; but being conscious, that in the Fall she had discover'd one of her Legs, at least as far as her Knee, and finding herself alone, among so many Men, when she look'd up, her Blushes had painted her Cheeks with a lovely red. The Violence of the Motion had made her lose all her Head-cloths, and her long coal-black black Hair, of which she had abundance, playing loosely about, almost cover'd her Back and Shoulders. Nothing could be whiter than her Skin, and her Eyes had something in them so sprightly and engaging, that the Duke, beholding her in this careless Posture, thought he had never seen any Thing so charming before; and having order'd two of his Grooms to catch her Horse, entreated her to take some Refreshment at the next House. She took a large Handkerchief out of her Pocket, ty'd it about her Head, and having tuck'd up, and hid as much of her Hair as she could, obligingly accepted of the Offer that was made her. She told the Duke, who walk'd a-foot along with her, that she liv'd with her Grand-mother, who had a House at Gulford, from whence she set out with a young Gentleman of her Acquaintance, to take a Ride; that the Gentleman, being a little Way before her, her Horse being fear'd at something that lay in the Road, was run away with her over Hedge over Ditch, till at last he had brought her in that By-Road, at the End of which he threw her. Whilst she was talking, the Duke observ'd, that she often look'd back, and seem'd very uneasy for this young Gentleman, in whose Company she was come out. Though Leonora, which was the young Lady's Name, was not above fifteen, and had all the Innocence and Sweetness in her Face belonging to that Age, yet, in her Discourse and Mein, she shew'd a Discretion far above it, and had something so commanding in her Eyes, as drew Respect from all that beheld them. The Duke was infinitely pleas'd with her, and having complimented her upon the Happiness of having 'scap'd so great a Danger, under several Proteſtations of his wiſhing for an Opportunity to ſerve her, they enter'd the Houſe where he was expected. As ſoon as they were come in, he recommended Leonora to the Miſtreſs of it, who, being inform'd of what had happen'd, took the lovely Stranger up into her Cloſet, and furniſh'd her with a Suit of Head-cloaths, and ſeveral little Accoutrements ſhe wanted. Leonora having learn'd from her, that it was the Duke of B—— that had brought her in, as ſoon as ſhe was come down again, begg'd his Grace's Pardon, that for Want of knowing his Perſon, ſhe had fail'd in the Reſpect that was due to his Quality. The Diſorders of her dreſs being rectify'd, ſhe appear'd abundantly more beautiful to the Duke, than before, and every Thing ſhe ſaid or did, was ſo raviſhing to him, that before they went to Dinner, ſhe had made an abſolute Conqueſt of his Heart. They were hardly ſat down at Table, but a Servant told them, that a Gentleman, who call'd himſelf Cleander, ask'd for a young Lady, whoſe Name was Leonora. Leonora, bluſhing at the Name of Cleander, would have riſen from Table, had not the Duke prevented her, and told her, the Gentleman ſhould be deſir'd to walk in. The Maſter of the Houſe hearing the Duke's Pleaſure, went out, and came back again immediately with the Gentleman, who, having pay'd his Reſpects to the Company, ſat down in a Chair that was ſet for him, over againſt Leonora. Cleander was a very handſome Man, of about nineteen, rather tall than ſhort, admirably well ſhap'd, and of a fair Complexion. He had a ſhort Campaign flaxen Wig, ty'd behind with a black Ribbon, a fine white Camlet Camlet Coat, with Silver Lace; his Waste-coat was of a rich Stuff, of green and silver, and his Breeches were of the same.

An. What! to ride on Horse-back with?

Lu. I confess 'twas no good Husbandy; but I cannot find Fault with his Fancy. His genteel Carriage, and a certain Easiness in his Behaviour, bespoke him to be of a refin'd Education, and he claim'd as deservedly the good Wishes of the Ladies, as Leonora was admir'd by the Men. The Duke, who observ'd 'em both very narrowly, being a great Master in the Language of the Eyes, by the first Looks they exchang'd, found what he had fear'd before, that they were happy Lovers. Having ask'd Cleander, how he came to find out Leonora, and understanding, that his Grooms meeting him, after they had taken up Leonora's Horse, had directed him thither; he could not forbear smiling at the obliging Care he had taken to serve his Rival. After Dinner, Cleander and Leonora, without any Ceremony to the Company, singl'd out one another, and went to walk in a Garden that join'd to the Room where they had din'd, which they had not left long, but an old Gentleman enter'd it, that seem'd to be upon very earnest Business. The Gentleman of the House had often seen him at Change, and the Duke knew him to be a Man of a vast Estate, but none of them suspected him to be, what from his own Mouth they heard he was, the Father of Cleander, that was come in Pursuit of his Son, whom he design'd, either by fair Means or by Force, to take away with him. All the Company seeming surpriz'd at the Passion the old Gentleman was in, none of 'em being able to imagine, what could be the Cause of a Father's Severity to a Son, that in all Appearance was so compleat, and deserving a Gentleman, Cleander's Father acquainted them with his Reasons in the following Manner: Though, said he, I have had several Children, I have none alive but this Son: He has always been of a mild, agreeable Temper, his Masters never complain'd of him, and I confess, that 'till he was eighteen, I cannot give one Instance of his Disobedience; but about a Twelve-month ago, he fell desperately in Love, and would have marry'd a young Slut that is a Beggar, and has hardly 1000 l. to her Portion. I have us'd all Means that either my self or Friends could invent, to dissuade him from it. I have told him, that I would never force his Inclinations, and design'd, whenever he should marry, to settle 2000 or 2500 l. a Year upon his Wife, if on his Side he would take Care to chuse one whose Fortune should deserve it. About three Months ago, I thought his Folly began to wear off, and was in Hopes, that to please an indulging Father, in a little Time he would wholly forget her; but this Morning I have found, that his seeming Compliance was only a Stratagem, the better to deceive me. Saying this, he pull'd a Letter out of his Pocket, and read the following Lines, or others to the same Purpose.
theres

S I R,

" IF you prevent it not suddenly, your Son
 " I will soon be marry'd to Leonora. This " Morning, instead of going into Cambridgeshire,
 " as you imagine, he is gone to Guilford, whence
 " he is to take his Mistress, with whom he in" tends to be at Gravesend to Morrow, in order " to embark for Holland; where, after his Mar" riage, he designs to shelter himself from the " first Transports of your Anger. Leonora's
 " Grand-

“Grand-mother is in the Plot, and furnishes him
 “with 1000 l. upon his own Credit. If you “make Haste, you may yet stop his Servant,
 “who, with a Couple of Trunks, is now wait“ing for the Tide at Billingsgate. When the “Truth of what I write, shall be known, I shall “discover to you who is your real, but now “Unknown Friend.

This Letter, said the old Gentleman, I receiv'd about two Hours after my Son was gone out. Whilst my Coach was getting ready, I sent to Billingsgate, and the Foot-man with the Trunks being secur'd, I came away with all the Speed imaginable. Hearing they were gone from Guilford, and not being able to trace 'em any farther for a good While, at last I met with some Reapers in a Field near by, that directed me thither. Cleander's Father, having said this, went into another Room, and desir'd his Son should be sent to him, without telling him who it was that wanted to speak with him; which being done accordingly, the young Gentleman, without being allow'd to take Leave of his Mistress, or any Body else, was hurry'd into the Coach. Being come Home, his Father confin'd him to his Chamber, and put a Guard upon him. There happen'd at that Time to be an outward-bound Turkey-Fleet, that lay waiting for the Wind at Portsmouth; which the old Gentleman being told of next Day, having consulted some Merchants, resolv'd to send his Son to Smirna, with a strict Charge to keep him there, 'till farther Orders. He was so cautious, as to see him on board himself, and stirr'd not from Portsmouth, 'till they had weigh'd Anchor, and the whole Fleet was under Sail.

An. Pray, Aunt, do you approve of this rigorous Way of treating Children? In.

Lⁿ. I see no Rigour us'd at all. Marriage is certainly one of the weightiest, and most material Points of Life; and if you see a Child under Age, that has been well educated, and consequently understands his Duty, resolv'd to enter upon it, not only without the Consent, but directly against the Commands of his Parents, what Remedy is there left, but locking him up, or sending him out of the Way?

An. I don't believe Cleander would ever have come to that Extremity, if he had seen a Possibility of obtaining his Father's Consent: And was it not barbarous, that a Parent should oppose a Child's Inclinations so violently, that had always been dutiful to him, when he had no other Plea against him, but his own Covetousness? Had Leonora been a five and twenty or thirty thousand Pound Fortune, no question, but the old Hunks would have lik'd her for a Daughter-in-Law, tho' she had been lame, crooked, or a Natural. Suppose she had been worth nothing, what he could give with his Son, was more than enough to make 'em live comfortably, if not splendidly. If he had really lov'd him, and regarded his Happiness more than his own avaricious Temper, would he not rather have seen his only Child live near him in the Enjoyment of the Woman he lov'd, than have sent him among Turks and Heathens, to spend the pleasantest Part of Life in Banishment and Affliction?

Lⁿ. A very pretty Doctrine! at that Rate, if a young Stripling, newly come from School, fancies a Cook-Wench, or perhaps a common Stumper, so he does but love her very well, and his Father has Money enough to keep 'em both,

you

And, oby. then. seem reasonable

you would advise a Man of a good Estate, to let him marry her, rather than that by a little Absence, he should strive to wean him from his unreasonable Passion.

An. Where was the Unreasonableness of Cleander's Passion? Leonora was a Gentlewoman, and though his Father, thinking on his own over-grown Estate, call'd her a Beggar, yet he own'd she had a thousand Pounds; she was a charming young Creature, brought up extraordinary well, and had a Discretion above her Years.

Lu. Don't lay too much Stress upon that, for, being but fifteen, she might have Discretion above her Age, and not have such a vast Stock neither. A very discreet Woman would hardly venture to run away with a 'Prentice, before he was out of his Time.

An. I thought Cleander liv'd with his Father, and had been brought up a Gentleman.

Lu. He was so; but would you not allow a Father the same Priviledge over his Son, that a Master has over his 'Prentice?

An. No, that Comparison won't hold; for a 'Prentice, after seven Years Service, is made free; but the Duty of Children to their Parents, never ceases; and if the Father lives long enough, the Son must be bound at fourscore, and can never be out of his Time.

Lu. That's a Mistake, Antonia; Children, as well as 'Prentices, are made free by the Law. It is true, that the humble Submission, Respect, and Veneration we owe to Parents, not only for our Being, which I think is the least Obligation, but likewise for the anxious Care, Trouble, and Charges they have been at, ought to last last for ever; but when we come to be of Age, we are no more ty'd to so strict an Obedience to their Commands, but we have Liberty to examine into the Equity of them; nay, may justly refuse to comply with them, if they are too unreasonable. Cleander and Leonora both might well have stay'd two Years longer; they had no Reason to fear, that in that Time, Age and Wrinkles should over-take them.

An. But they had no great Reason neither to think, that his covetous Father would more consent to that Match afterwards, than he did before.

Lu. If Cleander's Father, having seen the Constancy of his Son's Affection, had refus'd upon the Account of the Smallness of her Portion, to give him one suitable to his own Abilities, When his Son was come to Age, then he had been to blame, but he was much in the right in what he did; whilst his Son was under Age, and himself in a manner accountable for his Actions. It is not safe for Parents to give their Consent to any Thing of Moment, that Children may ask, whilst they are under Age, unless it brings a visible Advantage to them.

An. Why so, pray?

Lu. Because if Children miscarry in that very Thing, tho' they had been never so fond of it themselves, they'll be sure to upbraid their Parents with it. Why did they let me? I was raw and foolish, and knew no better; they had more Experience, and ought to have been wiser; I was under their Government; they might have hinder'd me; 'tis their Fault. These are commonly the Thanks with which the Indulgence of imprudent Parents is repaid.

An. But pray let me hear, how Leonora took this abrupt Departure ?

Lu. As soon as Cleander was come out of the Garden, the Duke went to supply his Place, and having walk'd a pretty while with his beautiful Mistress, and said abundance of obliging Things to her, they both came in; when the Gentlewoman of the House taking Leonora to the Window, told her, who it was that had fetch'd Cleander away. This was terrible News, and not being able to stifle the Grief it caus'd her, she turn'd pale and trembl'd, and all the Courage and Discretion she was Mistress of, could hardly keep her from bursting out into Tears before all the Company; but rallying all the Reason and Spirit, she could muster up, she ask'd for her Horse, and desir'd to take her Leave; but it not being thought adviseable she should venture upon a Horse, that had thrown her before, they sent her Home in the Coach. Several Days elaps'd, before she could get any Tidings of Cleander; but when she heard how his Father had dispos'd of him, and that against his Will he was sent to Smirna, she swooned away. About a Fortnight after the Duke had seen her first, thinking, that by this Time her Sorrow might be somewhat abated, he went to give her a Visit, and had a long Conference with her Grand-mother, who kept her Coach, and liv'd in very good Fashion. She had been marry'd twice, and enjoy'd about seven hundred a Year for Life, which was the Income of two Joyn-tures, of which, after her Death, one was to go to a Grand-son of hers, and the other, to a Kinsman of her second Husband's: Besides this,

she had 3 or 4000 Pounds in Money, which she design'd for Leonora. She was a Woman that lov'd Greatness, and was very sorry to see all the Hopes of a Match between Cleander and Leonora vanish'd. The Duke saw he had gain'd but little upon the young Lady this first Visit, her Heart being yet too much engag'd, and therefore, to lose no Time, resolv'd to make his chief Applications to her Grand-mother in his next. The old Woman knew that the Duke was marry'd, and that he could have no other Aim, than to debauch her Grand-daughter, and at best, keep her as a Mistress, yet the Conversation and Addresses of a Man of his Quality, together with the Presents he made her, were such powerful Temptations, that she not only hearken'd to his Proposals, but likewise promis'd him, that she would make her Granddaughter so sensible of the Honour he did her, that he should have no Reason to complain of her Conduct. Now Leonora was attack'd on both Sides; yet, in spite of the Duke's Assaults, and the old Woman's Treachery, she remain'd un-moveable; whether a Principle of real Vertue, a Dislike to something in the Duke's Person, or else the Love to Cleander, was the Cause, could not easily be determin'd; but the Duke, judging it to be the latter, went to Cleander's Father, who to his great Grief, had been inform'd from Turkey, that his Son's Love still continu'd.
 The Duke, as taking Part in his Concern, told him, that if Leonora was of the same Constancy, they would have one another at last, if ever Cleander liv'd to be his own Master; but that the only Thing to prevent it, would be, if each of the Lovers could be induc'd to believe the other dead. The Consequence of this Artifice was plain; the old Gentleman thank'd the Duke for his Advice, had Letters writ to Turkey that mention'd Leonora's Death, and spread the same false Report of his Son himself. Though Leonora had little or no Hopes of ever being Cleander's Wife, yet the News of his Death, afflicted her very much, and was far from making that Alteration in her, which the Duke had expected from it. He really lov'd her, and was always charm'd with her Company, which never was deny'd him; but yet, having courted her very near a twelve Month, without being able to attain the Height of his Wishes, he began to be tir'd: He had often profer'd to settle two thousand a Year upon her for her Life; which, with the Respect he shew'd her, and his Assiduity in following of her so long, without making any Progress, were undeniable Proofs of the Sincerity of his Passion. The old Woman, perceiving that the Duke was out of Patience, began to be very angry with her Granddaughter, and instead of using Perswasions, as she had done hitherto, now storm'd at her, calling her obstinate Slut, and ungrateful Baggage, and daily told her, that if she would neglect her Fortune, when she might, she must never expect to see a Farthing of her Money. Leonora being of a noble, generous Mind, despis'd her Threats, but yet quickly grew weary of the Life she led; and seeing but one Way to mend her self, and get rid of the Duke's Addresses, she took a brave Resolution, went directly to the Dutches of B——, and having told her who she was, and every Thing that had happen'd to her, begg'd her Protection in so earnest and obliging a manner, that the Dutchess, admiring the Virtue and Constancy of so young a Creature, promising to take Care of her, made her one of her Gentlewomen. The Duke was surpriz'd to see her among the Retinue of his Dutchess, but had the good Manners never to say any Thing of it. Being of an amorous Disposition, and seeing no Possibility of making Leonora yield, in a little Time he pitch'd upon another Object, on purpose to forget her. When Leonora had left Guilford, the old Woman was a little concern'd at the Loss of her Granddaughter, but that of my Lord Duke's Visits, and the Honour of having his Coach so often stand at her Door, was so great a Motification to her Vanity, that she would never be reconcil'd again to Leonora to her dying Day, which happening about half a Year after her Granddaughter's Departure, she left all what she had to dispose of, to her Grand-son. Leonora being very good-humour'd, and of a sweet, agreeable Temper, the Dutchess had a more than ordinary Kindness for her; she had abundance of Suitors, and her Beauty increasing, as she grew up in Years, she made daily new Conquests. The great ones that admir'd her, courted her for the same Purpose, as the Duke had done before; them she never harken'd to; and of those that had more honourable Intentions, there was none she could like; yet her Humour was so little coquet, that she often wish'd her self but indifferently settl'd in the World, to avoid the Multitude of Gal-

lants that was so troublesome to her. The Dutchess was very well acquainted with Leonora's Mind ; she had a great Confidence in her Vertue, but yet, considering her Age, and the Danger she was continually expos'd to, thought Marriage very adviseable for her : She knew, that among the Captives of her Beauty, there was a Jeweller, a rich and indoltrious Man, with whom she had often dealt considerably ; and being inform'd, that he seem'd to be in great Earnest, advis'd Leonora not to slip this Opportunity. A few Days after, the Dutchess spoke to him her self, and in a little Time the Match was made up, and Leonora marry'd. Her Husband's Name was Aclandor ; he was then worth above seven thousand Pounds, to which Leonora's Portion added another. In his Business he was skilful and stirring, and out of 'em a very good-humour'd Man, of a jovial Temper, and a merry Companion. To shun the Butter-flies that us'd to surround Leonora, when she was a Maid, upon her Request, he left the Pa'l-mall, and took a very good House in the City.

An. Then I am baulk'd in my Expectation, for I was still in hopes, that Cleander would have had her at last, in spite of all Opposition. When they walk'd together in the Garden, I thought them such a handsome Couple, so well match'd in every Thing, but Money, which neither of them valu'd, that I did not question but they were cut out for one another.

Lu. That is, because you are so us'd to Romances, where, in the Beginniug, you may always see who and who will be together ; but in Nature, it most commonly happens otherwise.

An. But did Cleander never again come to England?

Ln. I find that Leonora's Story takes up more Time than I thought, and therefore remember where I leave off, I'll tell you the Remainder after Supper.

THE TENTH
DIALOGUE
BETWEEN
Lucinda and Antonia.

Lucinda, BEcause I am not always in a Humour to answer them, ask what Questions you please when I have done, but don't interrupt me.

An. I am all Obedience, Aunt. The last you said, was, that Alexander —

Lu. I remember it very well ---. When the false News of Leonora's Death had reach'd Alexander's Ears, the first Emotions of his Grief were very violent; but those Transports of Affliction ceasing, and himself considering, that there was no recalling of the Dead, he grew calm at last, strove to divert his Sorrows as well as he could, and wanting for no Money, took all the Pleasures which that charming, as well as plentiful Country affords. Being one and twenty, he went to Naples by Sea, and from thence travelling through Italy, France, and Germany, after having been out four Years, came back to his native Country. He was much surpriz'd, when he heard, that Leonora was alive and marry'd;

but much more, when he understood, that the Report of his Death, as well as that of Leonora's, had both been industriously spread by his own Father. He writ to his Mistress, that she might not be frighten'd, and went to see her the next Day. Being grown taller and more Manly, in Spight of all her Vertue, Leonora could not forbear being charm'd with the Sight of him, and Cleander thinking her a thousand times more beautiful than when he left her, was in a continual Rapture; sometimes extolling the Strength of Graces, that in his Absence had been added to her Features, with all the Signs of Admiration, he took her in his Arms, and almost stifled her with his Embraces; then suddenly starting from her, he storm'd at his own Credulity, and violently lamenting the Cruelty of his Fate in bitter Execrations, exclaim'd against the treacherous Deceit that had been put upon 'em both. Sometimes assuming a softer Air, he would complain of having been too constant a Lover; then fixing his Eyes on hers, with an unspeakable Tenderness, and sighing fervently, dissolve in Tears, that silently upbraided her with having forgot him too soon; but when Leonora, mov'd by the Significancy of his dumb Language, as well as the Injustice of the Charge, had told him, with a candid Look, how tiresome and vexatious all Courtship, even of the most noble and most accomplish'd, had been to her, ever since he had been gone, and made him sensible, that she had taken her Refuge to Matrimony, for no other Reason, but because it was the only Means that could shelter her from the continual Plague of Love-Addresses. Oh! how his Soul was ravish'd! He fell upon his

Knees,

Knees, and throwing himself at her Feet, pay'd Adoration to her Vertue; but when she had softly chid him for the Extravagancy of his Passion, and smilingly rais'd him from the Ground, he could contain himself no longer; his Flame blaz'd out, he forgot her present State, as well as the Wretchedness of his own Destiny, and eagerly clasping himself about her, kiis'd her with so much Extasy of Joy, as if his Love had been in Tranquility, and himself in the Midst of Enjoyment. Leonora was at abundance of Trouble, before she could make Cleander recover his Discretion, and at some Difficulty to preserve her own, 'till at last they parted unwillingly in a great Confusion on both Sides. The next Morning she sent him a Letter, which being a very remarkable one, I have remember'd Word for Word, and was writ thus:

Dear Cleander,

" I Thought I might have allow'd your Visits,
 " and not committed a Crime; but Experience
 " has taught me, that I cannot see you " without: What an Excess of Weakness and " Frailty have I been guilty of! And yet, be" lieve me, the Violence I did to my self, in not " betraying more, was much greater. Once I " think I push'd you from me, but then I play'd
 " the Hypocrite. I was pleas'd with the vigorous " Transports of your Love, and took Delight " in the Fervency of your Kisses: Why should " I hide any Thing from you, Cleander? The " Minute you left me, I was upon the Brink of " Ruin: What would become of my Honour,
 " should I ever behold you again in that tran" scendant Height of Passion? I confess I should " not have Strength to resist the Temptation;
 " and

to preserve of her honour

" and yet I hope I am vertuous, because I feel " that I want not Resolution to avoid it for e" ver. It will be a hard Task, I own it, but " there is no other Remedy; and depend upon
 " it, we must never never meet again upon Earth.
 " If you suffer half the Torment in obeying
 " my rigorous Commands, that I feel in im" posing of them, be assur'd, that I shall always re" main your

Dear Leonora.

This was an Oracle to Cleander; for having left a Letter for his Father, in which he bid him to farewell for ever, full of Invectives against the barbarous Treachery he had play'd him, he went out of England, and whether he dy'd at Sea, or elsewhere, was never heard of any more.
 Though Leonora was presently inform'd of his leaving the Country, yet she seldom went Abroad, and took Delight in nothing for a great while after; but hearing no more Tidings of him, Time at last wore away her Concern, and she liv'd as she had done before. Alcandor, who had thought his Wife the most charming Creature in the World, when he courted her, was one of those, that after a Twelvemonth's Marriage, think the most beautiful, and the most indifferent Woman, the same. He could not be call'd an unkind Husband, for he gave her what ever she ask'd, let her do what she pleas'd, was seldom out of Humour, always treated her civilly, and lov'd no other Women; yet he wanted that engaging Tenderness, which is the Soul of Love. He was hardly ever at Home, but a Nights, and at Dinner-Time. In the Morning he minded getting of Money, and his Afternoon and Evening, were consecrated to his Diversion realistic assessment of the character of the man

version, and the Enjoyment of his Bottle and his Friend. Leonora had no more Affection for him when he marry'd her, than for a Stranger she had never seen, and lov'd him, only because she knew it to be her Duty. Being a witty Woman, that was conscious of her own Charms, and had refin'd Notions of Love, she could take but little Delight in a Husband's Indifferency, that knew no other Way of expressing his Kindness, but by his Embraces: A Palate like her's, could not relish the coarsest Food of Love, unless it had been season'd with that obliging Softness, and anxious Regard, in which the Delicacy of the Passion consists. She was reserv'd, and being careful of her Reputation, as well as her Vertue, very circumspect in all her Behaviour, and wonder'd her Husband would often come in with a Friend, leave him alone with her, and go about his Business, without shewing any Concern, or ever after examining into his Conduct, more than if she had been an old Woman, that had nothing tempting about her: This she thought was a great Carelessness, if not a despicable Neglect in a Man that had a young and beautiful Wife, and seldom convers'd with Men of the strictest Chastity. They had been marry'd about five Years, when coming Home one Night, he told Leonora, that he had made a Bargain with a Gentleman that was to live and board with them, who was certainly the best Company in the whole World. Having no Design to surprize, Antonia, but only to shew you what Danger the most vertuous of our Sex are expos'd to, if once they trust in Men, before I go on any farther, I'll tell you what this Gentleman was, and how Alcandor came to be acquainted acquainted with him. His Name was Mincio; as to his Person, he was a clean, well-lock'd, fashionable Man, near thirty, of an admirable Carriage, and exquisite Sense, but the greatest and most skilful Dissembler upon Earth. No Mimick could ever assume so many Forms as himself, and he could act more different Parts than any Player in the Universe. His Father, who had been dead several Years, in his Lifetime had been a very whimsical Fellow; and having a great mind his Son should learn to shift, and live in, as well as understand the World, had given him a very strange, and uncommon Education: For tho' he had a good Estate to leave him, when the Boy was twelve Years old, and a great Proficient in Latin and Greek, he took him from Westminster-School, to let him run of Errands, and be one of the Vinegar-Drawers in a great Tavern: Having been there about two Years, he put him to a shuffling Sort of a Solicitor, that had learn'd all his Law in the Fleet, and the Queen's-Bench; with him he stay'd as long as he had been with the Vintner, and then was sent to a broken Goldsmith, that was turn'd Stock-Jobber, and counted a great Villain. The Boy being a sharp Lad, in every Station pleas'd his Masters; and being an arch Rogue, at eighteen his Father made him a Nobleman's Page, where he stay'd almost three Years; and after that, giving him a small Cargo, sent him to the West-Indies. He had not been there long, but the old Man dy'd, and, to his great Amazement, left him eight hundred a Year, and above twice as much in Money. Coming away with the first Opportunity, he took Possession of his Estate.

state. Considering by himself, what Posts he had been in, it was impossible for him to find out what his Father had design'd to bring him up to.

An. Unless it was to the Gallows.

Lu. One would think so indeed. Mincio was of a Gentleman-like Disposition, and not having forgot his Latin, went to live at Oxford, having been there about two Years and a half, he went to see Italy and France, stay'd a twelve Month at Paris, and came back over Holland. Having finish'd his Travels, he took Chambers in Gray's-Inn, with an Intent of studying as much of the Law as should suit with his Pleasure. When he was about 26 Years old, he was jilted by a Woman he lov'd very passionately; and ever since resolving to be reveng'd on the whole Sex, he had made it his whole Business to deceive and ruin as many as he could. He despis'd every Thing that was easy, and only lay in Wait for such, as were counted cunning and difficult, and commonly for Women of a very good Reputation. Having heard of Leonora's exemplary Vertue and Reservedness, as well as dazzling Beauty, he thought attacking her would be a noble Enterprize. Being resolv'd upon this, he made himself acquainted with Alcandor, put on the facetious Humour he lik'd, and in a little Time, so bewitch'd him with his Company, that the other could hardly live a Day without him. In Conversation, Mincio always pretended to be a great Stranger to Love and Courtship, one that was no Admirer of the Ladies, and preferr'd a Bottle of Burgundy to all the Favours the finest Woman in Christendom had to bestow. Alcandor, who kept

a very good House, had often invited him to Dinner, but Mincio, upon some Pretence or other, had always refus'd him. They had known one another about a Month, when Mincio, being at the Tavern with Alcandor, and others, told the Company, that he was weary of Gray's-Inn, and design'd to take Lodgings in the City, if he could meet with a Place to his Mind. A Day or two after he had given this Hint, talking of it seriously to Alcandor, he told him, that he would not be with People that us'd to let their Rooms, that he hated the fiddle faddle of a great many Women in a House, and the bawling of Children; but with'd he could get in some quiet neat Family, of either a Merchant or Gentleman, that kept a good Table, such a one that was a little of his own Humour, that would be merry, and drink a Bottle with him in an Evening. He nam'd a great many other Things, describing the Particulars he wanted, with so much Cunning, that without discovering his Aim, you could hardly have found two Houses in all London, where those Requisites were to be met with, besides Alcandor's own. Mincio needed not to have been so over cautious; for Alcandor being so wholly wrapt up with him, that having swallow'd the Hook before the other had half finish'd his Cant, was overjoy'd at the Thoughts of having him so near him, immediately after an obliging Manner proffer'd him what Conveniences his House could afford. You may easily believe that that they soon agreed. Alcandor and Leonora had a pretty Boy, that was turn'd of Four, a mannerly Child, of an engaging Humour, whom they both, but especially the Mother, were deservedly fond of.

Leonora, though almost three and twenty Years old, having never had any other Children but this, and black Beauties commonly not fading so soon as others, was still in the full Strength of all her Charms. She had a penetrating Wit, and having seen a great deal of the World, was a very good Judge of Mankind. As soon as she had thrown her Eyes upon Mincio, and survey'd his courtly Mein, she presently concluded, from his gallant Air, that it would not be long before she should be attack'd, and arming herself with her wonted Virtue, kept upon her Guard. The first Thing in which she suspected him, was, that extraordinary Liking he express'd to her Son: He play'd with him for whole Hours, seldom came in, or went out, but had some little Present or other for him, and seem'd to admire every Thing he said or did. She knew, that Men, for the Generality of 'em, care but little for other Peoples Children, most always think them troublesome, and hardly ever take Pleasure in bearing those little Impertinencies, which the best of them will be guilty of, if you make them your Companions. And thus all the Love he bestow'd upon the Child for the first three or four Days, was by the Mother constru'd to be a Design upon herself; but when eight or ten Days being elaps'd, Mincio made not the least Advances, and Leonora having been alone with him several times, had not discover'd, by either Word or Look, the smallest Symptom of what she fear'd, she could not tell what to make of him. He always was merry and good-humour'd, to herself he was most respectfully civil, the Fondness he had shewn from the Beginning to her Son, seem'd daily daily to encrease, and himself extraordinary well pleas'd with the Entertainment he receiv'd. He had an admirable Knack of telling a Story, yet he never troubl'd his Company with any, but what were very much apropos, and seem'd to be wanted, or ever brought in two at one Time, that tended to the same Purpose, though his Head contain'd choice Varieties of them upon almost every Subject. This made him always new, as well as agreeable in Conversation: All his Discourse was as chaste and clean, as it was sprightly and diverting: He never made Use of a double Entendre, or any Expression, tho' in the highest of his Mirth, that had the least Tendency to Looseness or Immorality. Satyr he pretended not to be his Province, and never meddl'd with it upon any Account whatsoever: The only Thing he sometimes ridicul'd, was Love, always taking Care, that his Esteem and Veneration to the Sex, should be as conspicuous, as the Defiance which he bid to their Power. This latter, in a Gentleman of his Aspect, and of his Politeness to Leonora, was the most surprizing of all. She never had yet been in a Man's Company, but more or less, in either his Countenance, Speech, or Actions, she had observ'd, that the piercing Lustre of her Eyes made some Impression upon his Soul; but only Mincio, with an unaffected Freedom, could gaze on 'em, and doing Justice to her Beauty, speak of her Charms as unconcernedly, as the Minute after he would extol the happy Features of her little Son. What strange perverse Creatures we Women are! The chaste and wary Leonora, who would so bravely have resisted him, in Case he had assaulted her with Love; she that prepar'd herself herself for a vigorous Defence, whilst she dreaded the Danger of Vice, was foil'd by well dis-sembl'd Vertue, and envying his cold Indifferency, was ready to quarrel at the Weakness of her Charms, 'till quite disarm'd of all her Fear, she almost could have with'd him less intentible.

Mincio shew'd a particular Friendship for Alcan- dor, was always in his Interest, and seem'd to take part in every Thing that concern'd him;
 he had likewise much reform'd and wean'd him from the Tavern. Alcandor now often supp'd at Home, and Leonora, who always made one in their Conversation, had more of his Company, and was treated with more Tendernefs. Being of a grateful Temper, and knowing to whom she ow'd the Obligation, she began to look upon Mincio as a real Friend, and thinking him the best of Men, lov'd him with all the Sincerity of a Sister. Though Mincio profess'd a strict Vertue, yet his Humour was always gay, and nothing came from him that was not equally diverting, as it was instructive: Living in this Harmony, Leonora, as well as Alcandor, thought him the greatest Blessing that ever was come to their House. Mincio had been with them six Months, when suddenly he seem'd to be seiz'd with a deep Melancholy, and all his Sprightliness and Gayety was gone. It was so visible, that Leonora, speaking one Morning of it to Al- candor, he told her, that he had observ'd it as well as she: Knowing his ample Circumstances, they could not imagine what should be the Reason of it, and were both equally afflicted, to see their Friend so chang'd. Alcandor had often question'd him about it, Leonora had done the same; but neither of them could ever get any

any Thing from him, but some frivolous Excuse or other. When he saw sometimes that he was much observ'd, he would seem to strive to be merry, but with so much Reluctancy, that it was very easy to be seen his Mirth was forc'd. Alcandor, who was a great Enemy to Sadness, seeing he could gain nothing upon him, pity'd him, but went Abroad to look for better Company. Leonora remembering how he always us'd to laugh at being in Love, at first could not suspect that to be the Cause, 'till at last, thinking it might be a Punishment upon him, for confiding too much in his own Strength, she was resolv'd to try him. She now was as familiar, and us'd the same Freedom with him, as if he had been her Brother, and one Night talking together, Alcandor happening not to be at Home, Mincio counterfeited one that is very sad, and endeavours to appear otherwise; when Leonora taking Hold of this Opportunity, told him, Don't you know the Proverb, Mincio? Love and Cough won't be hid. 'Tis in vain you strive to conceal it. She look'd upon him, and saw him in so great a Confusion, that she wish'd she had not nam'd it. He presently seem'd to recover himself, and with a great deal of Concern, denying the Charge, took abundance of Pains to divert her from that Thought; looking all the while like one that sees his most weighty Secret betray'd. Now Leonora knew the Distemper, but how to find out the Cause, she could not tell: Who was the wonderful Fair, that triumph'd over that Heart, which she had always thought impregnable! The first she thought on, was herself; but should a Man of his Address and Ingenuity, that was in the same House with forced him, & then from signed me, & then with her, not all this While have found out a Way to let her know it, if he lov'd her; nay, should she herself never have discover'd it? As to others, she could think of no Body. Since he had liv'd with her, he had seldom been Abroad, but with her Husband, and of late he had been more at Home than ever; where ever he had plac'd his Affections, it was plain his Mistress was not kind, unless it was an Object, which either his Vertue or Discretion would not allow of, and he endeavour'd to stifle his Passion. But if so, then why might it not be herself? Leonora's Thoughts being thus employ'd to find out the Disturber of Mincio's Rest, she design'd to watch him narrowly, if it was possible to dive farther into his Secret, with a Resolution of keeping whatever she should discover of it: And now she observ'd, that he had lost that Freedom of his Look, which had been so remarkable in him, and seem'd to be afraid of encountering her Eyes. She likewise found, that he shunn'd being alone with her, but that if he was, and thought himself unobserv'd, he would stare at her with greater Eagerness than ever he had done before; if when his Eyes were fix'd upon her, she look'd upon him suddenly, they were immediately cast down as it were in a Hurry, or else his Head was quite turn'd aside; sometimes when he thought himself catch'd at it, he would start back, and often go away in Disorder, and leave her. These Symptoms would not let her doubt any longer, but that it was herself who unknowingly had kindl'd the Fire that consum'd him. Leonora thought Mincio's Heart an inestimable Prize; yet so great was her Goodness, and so little her Vanity, that instead of rejoicing at the mighty Conquest, her sorrow was unspeakable, to think, that to a Friend of his Value, her Eyes should give so desperate a Wound, which yet her Vertue would not suffer her to cure. Such an incomparable Counterfeit was Mincio, and so beautifully he could represent a struggling Passion, that tho' the Villain was calm within, he made the witty, clear-sighted Leonora believe, that nothing could exceed the Violence of his Love, unless it was the Reluctancy his Vertue made to suppress it. Having acted this for a While, and wound up Leonora's Soul to the highest Pitch of Compassion, to shew her how sincere his Endeavours were to overcome his Weakness, he talks of going into the Country, and makes all the necessary Preparations in order thereunto, but the Day before he was to go, he pretends to fall sick, sends for a Physician, his intimate Friend, who prescrib'd enough to make him so in Reality, if he had taken it; and in three or four Days Mincio grows very bad, he sends for Alcandor up, tells him several Things concerning Monies he had in other People's Hands, desires him to be his Executor, and making his Will, leaves all his real Estate to his Son, about whose Education he gives him some admirable Instructions. After that, being tir'd, he desires to be left alone. Alcandor tells his Wife what had pass'd, and really believes Mincio cannot live long. Leonora, who, during his Illness, reflecting on the Cause, had been inconsolable by what her Husband told her last, was struck with so much Sense of Gratitude and Sorrow together, that, not being able to contain herself, she retir'd to her Closet, and wholly abandon'd herself self to Grief. Oh! how she wept, when examining herself, she found, that she must be either criminal or ungrateful; when she consider what Obligations she ow'd to Mincio for the sincere and unaffected Purity of his Love! How she would then exclaim against the Rigour of Vertue, for not allowing her to reward his uncommon Passion! A Passion so bright, and yet so respectful, that, regardless of what concern'd himself, and sacrificing all to her, he chose rather to die in vertuous Silence, than that by opening his Lips, he should be guilty of the least Shadow of Offence. Having long enough indulg'd her Sorrows, she at last compos'd her Thoughts, as well as the great Concern she felt would let her, and going up into the sick Man's Chamber, she set herself down by his Bed-side. Mincio having seen her come in, beckon'd to his Man, who was the only Nurse he would admit of, to go out. Leonora having very tenderly enquir'd after his Health, and seeing herself alone with him, gently began to probe his Wound; telling him, she was sure there was something that oppress'd his Spirits, and fear'd he did himself Harm with too anxiously keeping a Secret that disturb'd him. Be not, said she, too scrupulous in trusting your Friends, but candidly unboosom your self, that if they can lend no Assistance, they yet may have the Satisfaction of shewing their Pity. Think not, unfeign'd Friend, that I say this, mov'd by an impertinent Curiosity, to dine into the Recesses of your Thoughts; but believe me, Mincio, that in my Soul I feel a nearer Regard, and am possess'd with a more solicitous Care for your Welfare, than perhaps you imagine I am capable of. Having thus affectionately express'd herself with a low melodious Voice,

Leonora's thoughts
